George W. Jones, delegate.

Mr. YELL, of Arkansas, was then qualified and took his seat.

Several other members came in during the day.

The CHAIR then announced 163 members as being present, and the House proceeded to business.

On motion of Mr. MUHLENBERG, a message was ordered to be sent to the Senate, to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives had assembled, and that the House was ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. MUHLENBERG, a committee of three was appointed, in conjunction with such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress had convened, and were ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the usual order for furnishing the members with newspapers to the extent of three daily papers, was adopted.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio then submitted a resolution ordering the appointment of the several Standing Committees, and moved to postpone its further consideration till to-morrow.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to postpone it until Thursday next.

Mr. WHITTLESEY hoped the gentleman from New Hampshire would not press that motion, for he saw no necessity at all for wasting three or four days at the commencement of the session. He hoped they had come there now for the purpose of transacting business, and in that hope he had moved this order.

Perhaps the gentleman from New Hampshire might be under the impression that, by the rules of the House, as now existing, no member could be appointed on a committee unless he were present. That was not the case. Any member elected to the House at that time might be appointed on a committee, whether present or not. He trusted, therefore, there would be no objection at all to the motion he had made. He reiterated the hope that they would have commenced this session with a firm determination to transact the business necessary and important for them to transact At the last regular session of Congress there were between seven and eight hundred bills remaining upon the calendar undisposed of; and why? Because they came there prepared to spend one month in holidays, consuming the whole of the first week in just meeting to adjourn, get their eight dollars a day, and then go gossipping through the city. He was admonished not to make such charges, but he had no allusion to any gentleman. His remark was a general one, but he was, nevertheless, extremely solicitous that the truth should be told, and they might as well commence telling it at the beginning of the session as toward the end, and what he had stated was known to all.

Now, the excuse had heretofore been, that the committees could not be appointed at so early a period, because the Speaker was unacquainted with the members. That was a reason generally entitled to much weight; but not in the present instance, for the Chair was as well qualified to appoint the committees now as he would be a week hence. Then Mr. W. would again ask, why should this whole week be consumed in idleness? Were there no pensioners to be provided for? no long standing claims of various kinds Why, in the private claims growing out of our land system alone, there were numerous cases reported favorably two years ago, but unacted on for the simple reason that there was not time. Now it seemed to him that they had been making this excuse to the people of the country long enough, and they ought to come there with a fixed determination to dispose of whatever public and private business came before them without loss of time, and at least not dissipate one whole week of the session. For the purpose of determining whether they were to dispose of the business of the country or not, he hoped the House would indulge him with the yeas and nays on the question of postponement.

The yeas and nays having been ordered,

Mr. CUSHMAN varied his motion to postpone till Wednesday instead of Thursday.

Mr. C. said he joined in the wish expressed by the gentleman from Ohio, that they would commence this session with a determination of going on with the public business as speedily as possible, but his motion did not contemplate delay. He had made it merely for the purpose of giving the Speaker an opportunity to appoint the committees in a judicious manner, by revising, where necessary, the appointments made last session. Heretofore it had never, he believed, been the practice to appoint the committees, or order their appointment, on the first day, but to postpone it till Thursday. Mr.C. however, was willing to make it a day earlier. The duty was a very important one, requiring great judgment and knowledge of the members. It is well known that the business of the House depended very much upon the organization of the committees; and it was therefore all-important that they should be well organized for the whole business. As, then, it was so highly expedient that the Speaker should be acquainted with the members, he hoped the House would concur with him in the necessity of granting sufficient time for that officer to perform the duty.

Again: they were all pretty well satisfied of the fact that they should not receive the President's Message till to-morrow; and the requirement of the gentleman's order on that day would assuredly interfere with the reception of that document.

Mr. WHITTLESEY interposed. He said the gentleman appeared to be laboring under an erroneous impression as to the object of his (Mr. W's) motion. He had mentioned, at the time he submitted the order, that he should not move its consideration then, but to-morrow; and he would, therefore, suggest whether the gentleman from New Hampshire had not better withdraw his motion, and when it came up to-morrow the House might then postpone or dispose of it.

Mr. CUSHMAN having expressed his assent,

The further consideration of the order was accordingly postponed till to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN the daily hour of meeting was directed to be 12 o'clock, m. until otherwise ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he wished to submit an amendment to the rules, and he inquired of the Chair whether the rules of the last session were to be re-adopted, or did they govern through a whole Congress.

The CHAIR replied that the practice had heretofore been that the rules adopted at the first session of that Congress were the rules until otherwise ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then submitted the following as an additional rule, which lies over one day:

"It shall also be the duty of the Clerk to compile a separate journal of the yeas and nays in such manner as to exhibit the questions decided, and the vote of each member; and at the end of every session he shall cause to be printed as many copies thereof as will be sufficient to furnish one copy for every thousand free male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years in the United States, the number of such free males to be determined by the Clerk from the latest statistical information; and he shall distribute such copies among the Executives of the several States, in proportion to the relative number of such free males in each State."

Mr. UNDERWOOD, on leave, then submitted the following resolution, which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before Congress copies of all orders and instructions given to the commander in chief of the force in Florida, authorizing him to raise troops or to call into service any portion of the militia, or to accept the services of volunteers for the purpose of suppressing Indian hostilities, and that said Secretary report what measures, if any, have been adopted to enlist and procure the services of other Indian warriors to fight against the Seminoles, the number of Indians so enlisted or taken into the service of the United States, the tribes to which they respectively belong, the length of time they have been engaged to serve and the amount of pay promised them; and that the said Secretary also report the number of troops of all classes engaged and called into service for the purpose of prosecuting the war in Florida at the present time.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the balances of unsettled accounts on the books of the Fourth Auditor; which, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

On motion of Mr. BOON,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, December 5, 1837.

Mr. HUBBARD of New Hampshire, and Mr. TALLMADGE of New York, arrived and took their seats.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee appointed in conjunction with that of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President with the information that a quorum of both Houses was in attendance, and ready to receive any communications he should be pleased to make, reported that the duty required had been performed, and that the President would send a message, in writing, to both Houses of Congress, at 12 o'clock this day.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States, through his private secretary, A. VAN BUREN, esq.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

We have reason to renew the expression of our devout gratitude to the GIVER OF ALL GOOD for his benign protection. Our country presents, on every side, the evidences of that continued favor, under whose auspices it has gradually risen from a few feeble and dependent Colonies to a prosperous and powerful Confederacy. We are blessed with domestic tranquillity, and all the elements of national prosperity. The pestilence which, invading, for a time, some flourishing portions of the Union, interrupted the general prevalence of unusual health, has happily been limited in extent, and arrested in its fatal career. The industry and prudence of our citizens are gradually relieving them from the pecuniary embarrassments under which portions of them have labored; judicious legislation, and the natural and boundless resources of the country, have afforded wise and timely aid to private enterprise; and the activity always characteristic of our people has already, in a great degree, resumed its usual and profitable channels.

The condition of our foreign relations has not materially changed since the last annual message of my predecessor. We remain at peace with all nations; and no efforts on my part, consistent with the preservation of our rights and the honor of the country, shall be spared to maintain a position so consonant to our institutions. We have faithfully sustained the foreign policy with which the United States, under the guidance of their first President, took their stand in the family of nations—that of regulating their intercourse with other powers by the approved principles of private life; asking and according equal rights and equal privileges; rendering and demanding justice in all cases; advancing their own, and discussing the pretensions of others, with candor, directness, and sincerity; appealing at all times to reason, but never yielding to force, nor seeking to acquire any thing for themselves by its exercise.

A rigid adherence to this policy has left this Government with scarcely a claim upon its justice, for injuries arising from acts committed by its authority. The most imposing and perplexing of those of the United States upon foreign Governments, for aggressions upon our citizens, were disposed of by my predecessor. Independently of the benefits conferred upon our citizens by restoring to the mercantile community so many millions of which they had been wrongfully divested, a great service was also rendered to his country by the satisfactory adjustment of so many ancient and irritating subjects of contention; and it reflects no ordinary credit on his successful administration of public affairs, that this great object was accomplished, without compromising, on any occasion, either the honor, or the peace of the nation.

With European powers no new subjects of difficulty have arisen; and those which were under discussion, although not terminated, do not present a more unfavorable aspect for the future preservation of that good understanding, which it has ever been our desire to cultivate.

Of pending questions, the most important is that which exists with the Government of Great Britain, in respect to our northeastern boundary. It is with unfeigned regret, that the people of the United States must look back upon the abortive efforts made by the Executive, for a period of more than half a century, to determine, what no nation should suffer long to remain in dispute, the true line which divides its possessions from those of other powers. The nature of the settlements on the borders of the United States, and of the neighboring territory, was for a season such, that this perhaps was not indispensable to a faithful performance of the duties of the Federal Government. Time, has, however, changed this state of things; and has brought about a condition of affairs, in which the true interests of both countries imperatively require that this question should be put at rest. It is not to be disguised, that with full confidence, often expressed, in the desire of the British Government to terminate it, we are apparently as far from its adjustment as we were at the time of signing the treaty of peace in 1783. The sole result of long pending negotiations, and a perplexing arbitration, appears to be a conviction, on its part, that a conventional line must be adopted, from the impossibility of ascertaining the true one according to the description contained in that treaty. Without coinciding in this opinion, which is not thought to be well founded, my predecessor gave the strongest proof of the earnest desire of the United States to terminate satisfactorily this dispute, by proposing the substitution of a conventional line, if the consent of the States interested in the question could be obtained. To this proposition, no answer has as yet been received. The attention of the British Government has, however, been urgently invited to the subject, and its reply cannot, I am confident, be much longer delayed. The general relations between Great Britain and the United States are of the most friendly character, and I am well satisfied of the sincere disposition of that Government to maintain them upon their present footing. This disposition has also, I am persuaded, become more general with the people of England than at any previous period. It is scarcely necessary to say to you, how cordially it is reciprocated by the Government and people of the United States. The conviction, which must be common to all, of the injurious consequences that result from keeping open this irritating question, and the certainty that its final settlement cannot be much longer deferred, will, I trust, lead to an early and satisfactory adjustment. At your last session, I laid before you the recent communications between the two Governments, and between this Government and that of the State of Maine, in whose solicitude, concerning a subject in which she has so deep an interest, every portion of the Union participates.

The feelings produced by a temporary interruption of those harmonious relations between France and the United States, which are due as well to the recollections of former times as to a correct appreciation of existing interests, have been happily succeeded by a cordial disposition on both sides to cultivate an active friendship in their future intercourse. The opinion, undoubtedly correct, and steadily entertained by us, that the commercial relations at present existing between the two countries are susceptible of great and reciprocally beneficial improvements, is obviously gaining ground in France; and I am assured of the disposition of that Government to favor the accomplishment of such an object. This disposition shall be met in a proper spirit on our part. The few and comparatively unimportant questions that remain to be adjusted between us, can, I have no doubt, be settled with entire satisfaction, and without difficulty.

Between Russia and the United States, sentiments of good will continue to be mutually cherished. Our Minister recently accredited to that Court, has been received with a frankness and cordiality, and with evidences of respect for his country, which leave us no room to doubt the preservation in future of those amicable and liberal relations which have so long and so uninterruptedly existed between the two countries. On the few subjects under discussion between us, an early and just decision is confidently anticipated.

A correspondence has been opened with the Government of Austria, for the establishment of diplomatic relations, in conformity with the wishes of Congress, as indicated by an appropriation act of the session of 1837, and arrangements made for the purpose, which will be duly carried into effect.

With Austria and Prusia, and with the States of the German empire, now composing with the latter the Commercial League, our political relations are of the most friendly character, whilst our commercial intercourse is gradually extending, with benefit to all who are engaged in it.

Civil war yet rages in Spain, producing intense suffering to its own people, and to other nations inconvenience and regret. Our citizens who have claims upon that country will be prejudiced for a time by the condition of its Treasury, the inevitable consequence of long-continued and exhausting internal wars. The last instalment of the interest of the debt due under the convention with the Queen of Spain has not been paid; and similar failures may be expected to happen, until a portion of the resources of her kingdom can be devoted to the extinguishment of its foreign debt.

Having received satisfactory evidence that discriminating tonnage duties were charged upon the vessels of the United States in the ports of Portugal, a proclamation was issued on the 11th day of October last, in compliance with the act of May 25, 1832, declaring that fact; and the duties on forreign tonnage which were levied upon Portuguese vessels in the United States, previously to the passage of that act, are accordingly revived.

The act of July 4, 1836, suspending the discriminating duties upon the produce of Portugal imported into this country in Portuguese vessels, was passed upon the application of that Government, through its representative here, under the belief that no similar discrimination existed in Portugal to the prejudice of the United States. I regret to state that such duties are now exacted in that country upon the cargoes of American vessels; and as the act referred to vests no discretion in the Executive, it is for Congress to determine upon the expediency of further legislation on the subject. Against these discriminations, affecting the vessels of this country and their cargoes, seasonable remonstrance was made, and notice was given to the Portuguese Government that unless they should be discontinued, the adoption of countervailing measures on the part of the United States would become necessary; but the reply of that Government, received at the Department of State through our Charge d'Affaires at Lisbon, in the month of September last, afforded no ground to hope for the abandonment of a system so little in harmony with the treatment shown to the vessels of Portugal and their cargoes in the ports of this country, and so contrary to the expectations we had a right to entertain.

With Holland, Sweden, Denmark, Naples, and Belgium, a friendly intercourse has been uninterruptedly maintained.

With the Government of the Ottoman Porte and its dependencies on the coast of the Mediterranean, peace and good will are carefully cultivated, and have been fostered by such good offices as the relative distance and the condition of those countries would permit.

Our commerce with Greece is carried on under the laws of the two Governments, reciprocally beneficial to the navigating interests of both; and I have reason to look forward to the adoption of other measures which will be more extensively and permanently advantageous.

Copies of the treaties concluded with the Governments of Siam and Muscat are transmitted for the information of Congress, the ratifications having been received, and the treaties made public, since the close of the last annual session. Already have we reason to congratulate ourselves on the prospect of considerable commercial benefit; and we have, besides, received from the Sultan of Muscat prompt evidence of his desire to cultivate the most friendly feelings, by liberal acts toward one of our vessels, bestowed in a manner so striking as to require on our part a grateful acknowledgment.

Our commerce with the Islands of Cuba and Porto Rico still labors under heavy restrictions, the continuance of which is a subject of regret. The only effect of an adherence to them will be to benefit the navigation of other countries, at the expense both of the United States and Spain.

The independent nations of this continent have, ever since they emerged from the colonial state, experienced severe trials in their progress to the permanent establishment of liberal political institutions. Their unsettled condition not only interrupts their own advances to prosperity, but has often seriously injured the other powers of the world. The claims of our citizens upon Peru, Chili, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, the Governments formed out of the Republics of Colombia, and Mexico, are still pending, although many of them have been presented for examination more than twenty years. New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador, have recently formed a convention for the purpose of ascertaining and adjusting claims upon the Republic of Colombia, from which it is earnestly hoped our citizens will, ere long, receive full compensation for the injuries originally inflicted upon them, and for the delay in affording it.

An advantageous treaty of commerce has been concluded by the United States with the Peru-Bolivian Confederation, which wants only the ratification of that Government. The progress of a subsequent negotiation for the settlement of claims upon Peru, has been unfavorably affected by the war between that power and Chili, and the Argentine Republic; and the same event is also likely to produce delays in the settlement of our demands on those powers.

The aggravating circumstances connected with our claims upon Mexico, and a variety of events touching the honor and integrity of our Government, led my predecessor to make, at the second session of the last Congress, a special recommendation of the course to be pursued to obtain a speedy and final satisfaction of the injuries complained of by this Government and by our citizens. He recommended a final demand of redress, with a contingent authority to the Executive to make reprisals, if that demand should be made in vain. From the proceedings of Congress on that recommendation, it appeared that the opinion of both branches of the Legislature coincided with that of the Executive, that any mode of redress known to the law of nations might justifiably be used. It was obvious, too, that Congress believed, with the President, that another demand should be made, in order to give undeniable and satisfactory proof of our desire to avoid extremities with a neighboring power; but that there was an indisposition to vest a discretionary authority in the Executive to take redress, should it unfortunately be either denied or unreasonably delayed by the Mexican Government. So soon as the necessary documents were prepared, after entering upon the duties of my office, a special messenger was sent to Mexico, to make a final demand of redress, with the documents required by the provisions of our treaty. The demand was made on the 20th of July last. The reply, which bears date the 29th of the same month, contains assurances of a desire, on the part of that Government, to give a prompt and explicit answer respecting each of the complaints, but that the examination of them would necessarily be deliberate; that in this examination, it would be guided by the principles of public law and the obligation of treaties; that nothing should be left undone that might lead to the most speedy and equitable adjustment of our demands; and that its determination, in respect to each case, should be communicated through the Mexican Minister here.

Since that time, an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary has been accredited to this Government by that of the Mexican Republic. He brought with him assurances of a sincere desire that the pending differences between the two Governments should be terminated in a manner satisfactory to both. He was received with reciprocal assurances; and a hope was entertained that his mission would lead to a speedy, satisfactory, and final adjustment of all existing subjects of complaint. A sincere believer in the wisdom of the pacific policy by which the United States have always been governed in their intercourse with foreign nations, it was my particular desire, from the proximity of the Mexican Republic, and well known occurrences on our frontier, to be instrumental in obviating all existing difficulties with that Government, and in restoring to the intercourse between the two Republics, that liberal and friendly character by which they should always be distinguished. I regret, therefore, the more deeply to have found in the recent communications of that Government so little reason to hope that any future efforts of mine for the accomplishment of those desirable objects would be successful.

Although the larger number, and many of them aggravated cases of personal wrongs have been now for years before the Mexican Government, and some of the causes of national complaint, and those of the most offensive character, admitted of immediate, simple, and satisfactory replies, it is only within a few days past that any specific communication in answer to our last demand, made five months ago, has been received from the Mexican Minister. By the report of the Secretary of State, herewith presented, and the accompanying documents, it will be seen, that for not one of our public complaints has satisfaction been given or offered; that but one of the cases of personal wrong has been favorably considered; and that but four cases of both descriptions, out of all those formally presented, and earnestly pressed, have as yet been decided upon by the Mexican Government.

Not perceiving in what manner any of the powers given to the Executive alone could be farther usefully employed in bringing this unfortunate controversy to a satisfactory termination, the subject was by my predecessor referred to Congress, as one calling for its interposition. In accordance with the clearly understood wishes of the Legislature, another and formal demand for satisfaction has been made upon the Mexican Government, with what success the documents now communicated will show. On a careful and deliberate examination of their contents, and considering the spirit manifested by the Mexican Government, it has become my painful duty to return the subject, as it now stands, to Congress, to whom it belongs, to decide upon the time, the mode, and the measure of redress. Whatever may be your decision, it shall be faithfully executed, confident that it will be characterized by that moderation and justice which will, I trust, under all circumstances, govern the councils of our country.

The balance in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1837, was forty-five millions nine hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and twenty-three dollars. The receipts during the present year from all sources, including the amount of Treasury notes issued, are estimated at twenty-three millions four hundred and ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and eighty-one dollars, constituting an aggregate of sixty-nine millions four hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and four dollars. Of this amount, about thirty-five millions, two hundred and eighty-one thousand three hundred and sixty-one dollars will have been expended at the end of the year on appropriations made by Congress; and the residue, amounting to thirty-four millions one hundred and eighty-seven thousand one hundred and forty-three dollars, will be the nominal balance in the Treasury on the first of January next. But of that sum, only one million eighty-five thousand four hundred and ninety-eight dollars is considered as immediately available for, and applicable to, public purposes. Those portions of it which will be for some time unavailable, consist chiefly of sums deposited with the States, and due from the former deposite banks. The details upon this subject will be found in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The amount of Treasury notes, which it will be necessary to issue during the year on account of those funds being unavailable, will, it is supposed, not exceed four and a half millions. It seemed proper, in the condition of the country, to have the estimates on all subjects made as low as practicable, without prejudice to any great public measures. The Departments were, therefore, desired to prepare their estimates accordingly; and I am happy to find that they have been able to graduate them on so economical a scale. In the great and often unexpected fluctuations to which the revenue is subjected, it is not possible to compute the receipts beforehand with great certainty; but should they not differ essentially from present anticipations, and should the appropriations not much exceed the estimates, no difficulty seems likely to happen in defraying the current expenses with promptitude and fidelity.

Notwithstanding the great embarrassments which have recently occurred in commercial affairs, and the liberal indulgence which, in consequence of those embarrassments, has been extended to both the merchants and the banks, it is gratifying to be able to anticipate that the Treasury notes, which have been issued during the present year, will be redeemed, and that the resources of the Treasury, without any resort to loans or increased taxes, will prove ample for defraying all charges imposed on it during 1838.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury will afford you a more minute exposition of all matters connected with the administration of the finances during the current year; a period which, for the amount of public moneys disbursed and deposited with the States as well as the financial difficulties encountered and overcome, has few parallels in our history.

Your attention was, at the last session, invited to the necessity of additional legislative provisions in respect to the collection, safe-keeping, and transfer of the public money. No law having been then matured, and not understanding the proceedings of Congress as intended to be final, it becomes my duty again to bring the subject to your notice.

On that occasion, three modes of performing this branch of the public service were presented for consideration. These were: the creation of a national bank; the revival, with modifications, of the deposite system established by the act of the 23d of June, 1836, permitting the use of the public moneys by the banks; and the discontinuance of the use of such institutions for the purposes referred to, with suitable provisions for their accomplishment through the agency of public officers. Considering the opinions of both Houses of Congress on the two first propositions as expressed in the negative, in which I entirely concur, it is unnecessary for me again to recur to them. In respect to the last, you have had an opportunity since your adjournment, not only to test still further the expediency of the measure, by the continued practical operation of such parts of it as are now in force, but also to discover—what should ever be sought for and regarded with the utmost deference—the opinions and wishes of the people. The national will is the supreme law of the Republic, and, on all subjects within the limits of his constitutional powers, should be faithfully obeyed by the public servant. Since the measure in question was submitted to your consideration, most of you have enjoyed the advantage of personal communication with your constituents. For one State only has an election been held for the Federal Government; but the early day at which it took place, deprives the measure under consideration of much of the support it might otherwise have derived from the result. Local elections for State officers have, however, been held in several of the States, at which the expediency of the plan proposed by the Executive has been more or less discussed. You will, I am confident, yield to their results the respect due to every expression of the public voice. Desiring, however, to arrive at truth and a just view of the subject in all its bearings, you will at the same time remember, that questions of far deeper and more immediate local interest, than the fiscal plans of the National Treasury, were involved in those elections. Above all, we cannot overlook the striking fact, that there were at the time in those States more than one hundred and sixty millions of bank capital, of which large portions were subject to actual forfeiture—other large portions upheld only by special and limited legislative indulgences—and most of it, if not all, to a greater or less extent, dependent for a continuance of its corporate existence upon the will of the State Legislatures to be then chosen. Apprised of this circumstance, you will judge, whether it is not most probable that the peculiar condition of that vast interest in these respects, the extent to which it has been spread through all the ramifications of society, its direct connection with the then pending elections, and the feelings it was calculated to infuse into the canvass, have exercised a far greater influence over the result, than any which could possibly have been produced by a conflict of opinion in respect to a question in the administration of the General Government, more remote and far less important in its bearings upon that interest.

I have found no reason to change my own opinion as to the expediency of adopting the system proposed, being perfectly satisfied that there will be neither stability nor safety, either in the fiscal affairs of the Government, or in the pecuniary transactions of individuals and corporations, so long as a connection exists between them, which, like the past, offers such strong inducements to make them the subjects of political agitation. Indeed, I am more than ever convinced of the dangers to which the free and unbiassed exercise of political opinion—the only sure foundation and safeguard of republican government—would be exposed by any further increase of the already overgrown influence of corporate authorities. I cannot, therefore, consistently with my views of duty, advise a renewal of a connection which circumstances have dissolved.

The discontinuance of the use of State banks for fiscal purposes ought not to be regarded as a measure of hostility toward those institutions. Banks, properly established and conducted, are highly useful to the business of the country, and will doubtless continue to exist in the States, so long as they conform to their laws, and are found to be safe and beneficial. How they should be created, what privileges they should enjoy, under what responsibilities they should act, and to what restrictions they should be subject, are questions which, as I observed on a previous occasion, belong to the States to decide. Upon their rights, or the exercise of them, the General Government can have no motive to encroach. Its duty toward them is well performed, when it refrains from legislating for their special benefit, because such legislation would violate the spirit of the Constitution, and be unjust to other interests; when it takes no steps to impair their usefulness, but so manages its own affairs as to make it the interest of those institutions to strengthen and improve their condition for the security and welfare of the community at large. They have no right to insist on a connection with the Federal Government, nor on the use of the public money for their own benefit. The object of the measure under consideration is, to avoid for the future a compulsory connection of this kind. It proposes to place the General Government, in regard to the essential points or the collection, safe-keeping, and transfer of the public money, in a situation which shall relieve it from all dependence on the will of irresponsible individuals or corporations; to withdraw those moneys from the uses of private trade, and confide them to agents constitutionally selected and controlled by law; to abstain from improper interference with the industry of the people, and withhold inducements to improvident dealings on the part of individuals; to give stability to the concerns of the Treasury; to preserve the measures of the Government from the unavoidable reproaches that flow from such a connection, and the banks themselves from the injurious effects of a supposed participation in the political conflicts of the day, from which they will otherwise find it difficult to escape.

These are my views upon this important subject; formed after careful reflection, and with no desire but to arrive at what is most likely to promote the public interest. They are now, as they were before, submitted with unfeigned deference for the opinions of others. It was hardly to be hoped that changes so important, on a subject so interesting, could be made without producing a serious diversity of opinion; but so long as those conflicting views are kept above the influence of individual or local interests; so long as they pursue only the general good, and are discussed with moderation and candor, such diversity is a benefit, not an injury. If a majority of Congress see the public welfare in a different light; and more especially if they should be satisfied that the measure proposed would not be acceptable to the people; I shall look to their wisdom to substitute such as may be more conducive to the one, and more satisfactory to the other. In any event, they may confidently rely on my hearty co-operation to the fullest extent, which my views of the Constitution and my sense of duty will permit.

It is obviously important to this branch of the public service, and to the business and quiet of the country, that the whole subject should in some way be settled and regulated by law; and, if possible, at your present session. Besides the plans above referred to, I am not aware that any one has been suggested, except that of keeping the public money in the State banks in special deposite. This plan is, to some extent, in accordance with the practice of the Government, and with the present arrangement of the Treasury Department; which, except, perhaps, during the operation of the late deposite act, has always been allowed, even during the existence of a National Bank, to make a temporary use of the State banks, in particular places, for the safe keeping of portions of the revenue. This discretionary power might be continued, if Congress deem it desirable, whatever general system be adopted. So long as the connection is voluntary, we need perhaps anticipate few of those difficulties, and little of that dependence, on the banks, which must attend every such connection when compulsory in its nature, and when so arranged as to make the banks a fixed part of the machinery of Government. It is undoubtedly in the power of Congress so to regulate and guard it as to prevent the public money from being applied to the use, or intermingled with the affairs, of individuals. Thus arranged, although it would not give to the Government that entire control over its own funds which I desire to secure to it by the plan I have proposed, it would, it must be admitted, in a great degree, accomplish one of the objects which has recommended that plan to my judgment—the separation of the fiscal concerns of the Government from those of individuals or corporations. With these observations, I recommend the whole matter to your dispassionate reflection; confidently hoping that some conclusion may be reached by your deliberations, which, on the one hand, shall give safety and stability to the fiscal operations of the Government, and be consistent, on the other, with the genius of our institutions, and with the interests and wishes of the great mass of our constituents.

It was my hope that nothing would occur to make necessary, on this occasion, any allusion to the late National Bank. There are circumstances, however, connected with the present state of its affairs, that bear so directly on the character of the Government and the welfare of the citizen, that I should not feel myself excused in neglecting to notice them. The charter which terminated its banking privileges on the fourth of March, 1836, continued its corporate powers two years more, for the sole purpose of closing its affairs, with authority "to use the corporate name, style and capacity, for the purpose of suits for a final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and acts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal and mixed, but for no other purpose or in any other manner whatsoever." Just before the banking privileges ceased, its effects were transferred by the bank to a new State institution then recently incorporated, in trust, for the discharge of its debts and the settlement of its affairs. With this trustee, by authority of Congress, an adjustment was subsequently made of the large interest which the Government had in the stock of the institution. The manner in which a trust unexpectedly created upon the act granting the charter, and involving such great public interests, has been executed, would, under any circumstances, be a fit subject of inquiry; but much more does it deserve your attention, when it embraces the redemption of obligations to which the authority and credit of the United States have given value. The two years allowed are now nearly at an end. It is well understood that the trustee has not redeemed and cancelled the outstanding notes of the bank, but has reissued, and is actually reissuing, since the third of March, 1836, the notes which have been received by it to a vast amount. According to its own official statement, so late as the first of October last, nineteen months after the banking privileges given by the charter had expired, it had under its control uncancelled notes of the late Bank of the United States to the amount of twenty-seven millions five hundred and sixty-one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six dollars, of which six millions one hundred and seventy-five thousand eight hundred and sixty-one dollars were in actual circulation, one million four hundred and sixty-eight thousand six hundred and twenty-seven dollars at State bank agencies, and three millions two thousand three hundred and ninety dollars in transitu; thus showing that upwards of ten millions and a half of the notes of the old bank were then still kept outstanding. The impropriety of this procedure is obvious: it being the duty of the trustee to cancel and not to put forth the notes of an institution, whose concerns it had undertaken to wind up. If the trustee has a right to reissue these notes now, I can see no reason why it may not continue to do so after the expiration of the two years. As no one could have anticipated a course so extraordinary, the prohibitory clause of the charter above quoted was not accompanied by any penalty or other special provision for enforcing it; nor have we any general law for the prevention of similar acts in future.

But it is not in this view of the subject alone that your interposition is required. The United States, in settling with the trustee for their stock, have withdrawn their funds from their former direct liability to the creditors of the old bank, yet notes of the institution continue to be sent forth in its name, and apparently upon the authority of the United States. The transactions connected with the employment of the bills of the old bank are of vast extent; and should they result unfortunately, the interests of individuals may be deeply compromised. Without undertaking to decide how far, or in what form, if any, the trustee could be made liable for notes which contain no obligation on its part; or the old bank, for such as are put in circulation after the expiration of its charter, and without its authority; or the Government for indemnity, in case of loss, the question still presses itself upon your consideration, whether it is consistent with duty and good faith on the part of the Government, to witness this proceeding without a single effort to arrest it.

The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury, will show how the affairs of that office have been conducted for the past year. The disposition of the public lands is one of the most important trusts confided to Congress. The practicability of retaining the title and control of such extensive domains in the General Government, and at the same time admittin the Territories embracing them into the Federal Union as coequals with the original States, was seriously doubted by many of our wisest statesmen. All feared that they would become a source of discord, and many carried their apprehensions so far as to see in them the seeds of a future dissolution of the Confederacy. But happily our experience has already been sufficient to quiet, in a great degree, all such apprehensions. The position, at one time assumed—that the admission of new States into the Union on the same footing with the original States, was incompatible with a right of soil in the United States, and operated as a surrender thereof, notwithstanding the terms of the compacts by which their admission was designed to be regulated—has been wisely abandoned. Whether in the new or the old States, all now agree that the right of soil to the public lands remains in the Federal Government, and that these lands constitute a common property, to be disposed of for the common benefit of all the States, old and new. Acquiescence in this just principle by the people of the new States has naturally promoted a disposition to adopt the most liberal policy in the sale of the public lands. A policy which should be limited to the mere object of selling the lands for the greatest possible sum of money, without regard to higher considerations, finds but few advocates. On the contrary, it is generally conceded, that whilst the mode of disposition adopted by the Government, should always be a prudent one, yet its leading object ought to be the early settlement and cultivation of the lands sold; and that it should discountenance, if it cannot prevent, the accumulation of large tracts in the same hands, which must necessarily retard the growth of the new States, or entail upon them a dependent tenantry, and its attendant evils.

A question embracing such important interests, and so well calculated to enlist the feelings of the people in every quarter of the Union, has very naturally given rise to numerous plans for the improvement of the existing system. The distinctive features of the policy that has hitherto prevailed, are, to dispose of the public lands at moderate prices, thus enabling a greater number to enter into competition for their purchase, and accomplishing a double object of promoting their rapid settlement by the purchasers, and at the same time increasing the receipts of the Treasury; to sell for cash, thereby preventing the disturbing influence of a large mass of private citizens indebted to the Government, which they have a voice in controlling; to bring them into market no faster than good lands are supposed to be wanted for improvements, thereby preventing the accumulation of large tracts in few hands; and to apply the proceeds of the sales to the general purposes of the Government; thus diminishing the amount to be raised from the people of the States by taxation, and giving each State its portion of the benefits to be derived from this common fund in a manner the most quiet, and at the same time, perhaps, the most equitable, that can be devised. These provisions, with occasional enactments in behalf of special interests deemed entitled to the favor of the Government, have, in their execution, produced results as beneficial upon the whole as could reasonably be expected in a matter so vast, so complicated, and so exciting. Upwards of seventy millions of acres have been sold, the greater part of which is believed to have been purchased for actual settlement. The population of the new States and Territories created out of the public domain, increased between 1800 and 1830 from less than sixty thousand to upwards of two millions three hundred thousand souls, constituting, at the latter period, about one-fifth of the whole people of the United States. The increase since cannot be accurately known, but the whole may now be safely estimated at over three and a half millions of souls; composing nine States, the representatives of which constitute above one-third of the Senate, and over one-sixth of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Thus has been formed a body of free and independent landholders, with a rapidiy unequalled in the history of mankind; and this great result has been produced without leaving any thing for future adjustment between the Government and its citizens. The system under which so much has been accomplished cannot be intrinsically bad, and with occasional modifications, to correct abuses and adapt it to changes of circumstances, may, I think, be safely trusted for the future. There is, in the management of such extensive interests, much virtue in stability, and although great and obvious improvements should not be declined, changes should never be made without the fullest examination, and the clearest demonstration of their practical utility. In the history of the past, we have an assurance that this safe rule of action will not be departed from in relation to the public lands; nor is it believed that any necessity exists for interfering with the fundamental principles of the system, or that the public mind, even in the new States, is desirous of any radical alterations. On the contrary, the general disposition appears to be, to make such modifications and additions only as will the more effectually carry out the original policy of filling our new States and Territories with an industrious and independent population.

The modification most perseveringly pressed upon Congress, which has occupied so much of its time for years past, and will probably do so for a long time to come, if not sooner satisfactorily adjusted, is a reduction in the cost of such portions of the public lands as are ascertained to be unsaleable at the rate now established by law, and a graduation, according to their relative value, of the prices at which they may hereafter be sold. It is worthy of consideration whether justice may not be done to every interest in this matter, and a vexed question set at rest, perhaps for ever, by a reasonable compromise of conflicting opinions. Hitherto, after being offered at public sale, lands have been disposed of at one uniform price, whatever difference there might be in their intrinsic value. The leading considerations urged in favor of the measure referred to are, that in almost all the land districts, and particularly in those in which the lands have been long surveyed and exposed to sale, there are still remaining numerous and large tracts of every gradation of value, from the Government price downwards; that these lands will not be purchased at the Government price, so long as better can be conveniently obtained for the same amount; that there are large tracts which even the improvements of the adjacent lands will never raise to that price; and that the present uniform price, combined with their irregular value, operates to prevent a desirable compactness of settlement in the new States, and to retard the full development of that wise policy on which our land system is founded, to the injury not only of the several States where the lands lie, but of the United States as a whole.

The remedy proposed has been a reduction of prices according to the length of time the lands have been in market, without reference to any other circumstances. The certainty that the efflux of time would not always in such cases, and perhaps not even generally, furnish a true criterion of value; and the probability that persons residing in the vicinity, as the period for the reduction of prices approached, would postpone purchases they would otherwise make, for the purpose of availing themselves of the lower price, with other considerations of a similar character, have hitherto been successfully urged to defeat the graduation upon time.

May not all reasonable desires upon this subject be satisfied without encountering any of these objections? All will concede the abstract principle, that the price of the public lands should be proportioned to their relative value, so far as that can be accomplished without departing from the rule heretofore observed, requiring fixed prices in cases of private entries. The difficulty of the subject seems to lie in the mode of ascertaining what that value is. Would not the safest plan be that which has been adopted by many of the States as the basis of taxation—an actual valuation of lands, and classification of them into different rates? Would it not be practicable and expedient to cause the relative value of the public lands in the old districts, which have been for a certain length of time in market, to be appraised, and classed into two or more rates below the present minimum price, by the officers now employed in this branch of the public service, or in any other mode deemed preferable, and to make those prices permanent, if upon the coming in of the report they shall prove satisfactory to Congress? Cannot all the objects of graduation be accomplished in this way, and the objections which have hitherto been urged against it avoided? It would seem to me that such a step, with a restriction of the sales to limited quantities, and for actual improvement, would be free from all just exception.

By the full exposition of the value of the lands thus furnished and extensively promulgated, persons living at a distance would be informed of their true condition, and enabled to enter into competition with those residing in the vicinity; the means of acquiring an independent home would be brought within the reach of many who are unable to purchase at present prices; the population of the new States would be made more compact, and large tracts would be sold which would otherwise remain on hand; not only would the land be brought within the means of a larger number of purchasers, but many persons possessed of greater means would be content to settle on a larger quantity of the poorer lands, rather than emigrate further west in pursuit of a smaller quantity of better lands. Such a measure would also seem to be more consistent with the policy of the existing laws—that of converting the public domain into cultivated farms owned by their occupants. That policy is not best promoted by sending emigration up the almost interminable streams of the West, to occupy in groups the best spots of land, leaving immense wastes behind them, and enlarging the frontier beyond the means of the Government to afford it adequate protection; but in encouraging it to occupy, with reasonable denseness, the territory over which it advances, and find its best defence in the compact front which it presents to the Indian tribes. Many of you will bring to the consideration of the subject the advantages of local knowledge and greater experience, and all will be desirous of making an early and final disposition of every disturbing question in regard to this important interest. If these suggestions shall in any degree contribute to to the accomplishment of so important a result, it will afford me sincere satisfaction.

In some sections of the country, most of the public lands have been sold, and the registers and receivers have very little to do. It is a subject worthy of inquiry whether, in many cases, two or more districts may not be consolidated, and the number of persons employed in this business considerably reduced. Indeed, the time will come when it will be the true policy of the General Government, as to some of the States, to transfer to them, for a reasonable equivalent, all the refuse and unsold lands, and to withdraw the machinery of the federal land offices altogether. All who take a comprehensive view of our federal system, and believe that one of its greatest excellencies consists in interfering as little as possible with the internal concerns of the States, look forward with great interest to this result.

A modification of the existing laws in respect to the prices of the public lands, might also have a favorable influence on the legislation of Congress, in relation to another branch of the subject. Many who have not the ability to buy at present prices, settle on those lands, with the hope of acquiring from their cultivation the means of purchasing under pre-emption laws, from time to time passed by Congress. For this encroachment on the rights of the United States, they excuse themselves under the plea of their own necessities; the fact that they dispossess nobody, and only enter upon the waste domain; that they give additional value to the public lands in their vicinity, and their intention ultimately to pay the Government price. So much weight has from time to time been attached to these considerations, that Congress have passed laws giving actual settlers on the public lands a right of pre-emption to the tracts occupied by them at the minimum price. These laws have in all instances been retrospective in their operation; but in a few years after their passage, crowds of new settlers have been found on the public lands, for similar reasons, and under like expectations, who have been indulged with the same privileges. This course of legislation tends to impair public respect for the laws of the country. Either the laws to prevent intrusion upon the public lands should be executed, or, if that should be impracticable or inexpedient, they should be modified or repealed. If the public lands are to be considered as open to be occupied by any, they should, by law, be thrown open to all. That which is intended, in all instances, to be legalized, should at once be made legal, that those who are disposed to conform to the laws may enjoy at least equal privileges with those who are not. But it is not believed to be the disposition of Congress to open the public lands to occupancy without regular entries and payment of the Government price, as such a course must tend to worse evils than the credit system, which it was found necessary to abolish. It would seem, therefore, to be the part of wisdom and sound policy to remove, as far as practicable, the causes which produce intrusions upon the public lands, and then take efficient steps to prevent them in future. Would any single measure be so effective in removing all plausible grounds for those intrusions as the graduation of price already suggested? A short period of industry and economy in any part of our country would enable the poorest citizen to accumulate the means to buy him a home at the lower prices, and leave him without apology for settling on lands not his own. If he did not, under such circumstances, he would enlist no sympathy in his favor; and the laws would be readily executed, without doing violence to public opinion.

A large portion of our citizens have seated themselves on the public lands, without authority, since the passage of the last pre-emption law, and now ask the enactment of another to enable them to retain the lands occupied, upon payment of the minimum Government price. They ask that which has been repeatedly granted before. If the future may be judged of by the past, little harm can be done to the interests of the Treasury by yielding to their request. Upon a critical examination, it is found that the lands sold at the public sales since the introduction of cash payments in 1820, have produced, on an average, the nett revenue of only six cents an acre more than the minimum Government price. There is no reason to suppose that future sales will be more productive. The Government, therefore, has no adequate pecuniary interest to induce it to drive these people from the lands they occupy, for the purpose of selling them to others.

Entertaining these views, I recommend the passage of a pre-emption law for their benefit, in connection with the preparatory steps toward the graduation of the price of the public lands, and further and more effectual provisions to prevent intrusions hereafter. Indulgence to those who have settled on these lands with expectations that past legislation would be made a rule for the future, and at the same time removing the most plausible ground on which intrusions are excused, and adopting more efficient means to prevent them hereafter, appear to me the most judicious disposition which can be made of this difficult subject. The limitations and restrictions to guard against abuses in the execution of a pre-emption law, will necessarily attract the careful attention of Congress; but under no circumstances is it considered expedient to authorize floating claims in any shape. They have been heretofore, and doubtless would be hereafter, most prolific sources of fraud and oppression, and instead of operating to confer the favor of the Government on industrious settlers, are often used only to minister to a spirit of cupidity at the expense of the most meritorious of that class.

The accompanying report of the Secretary of War will bring to your view the state of the Army, and all the various subjects confided to the superintendence of that officer.

The principal part of the Army has been concentrated in Florida, with a view, and in the expectation, of bringing the war in that Territory to a speedy close. The necessity of stripping the posts on the maritime and inland frontiers of their entire garrisons, for the purpose of assembling in the field an army of less than four thousand men, would seem to indicate the necessity of increasing our regular forces; and the superior efficiency, as well as greatly diminished expense of that description of troops, recommend this measure as one of economy as well as of expediency. I refer to the report for the reasons which have induced the Secretary of War to urge the reorganization and enlargement of the staff of the Army, and of the ordnance corps, in which I fully concur.

It is not, however, compatible with the interest of the people to maintain, in time of peace, a regular force adequate to the defence of our extensive frontiers. In periods of danger and alarm, we must rely principally upon a well-organized militia; and some general arrangement that will render this description of force more efficient, has long been a subject of anxious solicitude. It was recommended to the first Congress by General Washington, and has been since frequently brought to your notice, and recently its importance strongly urged by my immediate predecessor. The provision in the Constitution that renders it necessary to adopt an uniform system of organization for the militia throughout the United States, presents an insurmountable obstacle to an efficient arrangement by the classification heretofore proposed, and I invite your attention to the plan which will be submitted by the Secretary of War, for the organization of volunteer corps, and the instruction of militia officers, as more simple and practicable, if not equally advantageous, as a general arrangement of the whole militia of the United States.

A moderate increase of the corps, both of military and topographical engineers, has been more than once recommended by my predecessor; and my conviction of the propriety, not to say necessity, of the measure, in order to enable them to perform the various and important duties imposed upon them, induces me to repeat the recommendation.

The Military Academy continues to answer all the purposes of its establishment, and not only furnishes well-educated officers to the Army, but serves to diffuse throughout the mass of our citizens individuals possessed of military knowledge, and the scientific attainments of civil and military engineering. At present, the cadet is bound, with consent of his parents or guardians, to remain in service five years from the period of his enlistment, unless sooner discharged; thus exacting only one year's service in the Army after his education is completed. This does not appear to me sufficient. Government ought to command for a longer period the services of those who are educated at the public expense; and I recommend that the time of enlistment be extended to seven years, and the terms of the engagement strictly enforced.

The creation of a national foundry for cannon, to be common to the service of the Army and Navy of the United States, has been heretofore recommended, and appears to be required in order to place our ordnance on an equal footing with that of other countries, and to enable that branch of the service to control the prices of those articles, and graduate the supplies to the wants of the Government, as well as to regulate their quality and ensure their uniformity. The same reasons induce me to recommend the erection of a manufactory of gunpowder, to be under the direction of the Ordnance office. The establishment of a manufactory of small arms west of the Alleghany mountains, upon the plan proposed by the Secretary of War, will contribute to extend throughout that country the improvements which exist in establishments of a similar description in the Atlantic States, and tend to a much more economical distribution of the armament required in the western portion of our Union.

The system of removing the Indians west of the Mississippi, commenced by Mr. Jefferson in 1804, has been steadily persevered in by every succeeding President, and may be considered the settled policy of the country. Unconnected at first with any well defined system for their improvement, the inducements held out to the Indians were confined to the greater abundance of game to be found in the West; but when the beneficial effects of their removal were made apparent, a more philanthropic and enlightened policy was adopted, in purchasing their lands east of the Mississippi. Liberal prices were given, and provisions inserted in all the treaties with them, for the application of the funds they received in exchange, to such purposes as were best calculated to promote their present welfare, and advance their future civilization. These measures have been attended thus far with the happiest results.

It will be seen, by referring to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that the most sanguine expectations of the friends and promoters of this system have been realized. The Choctaws, Cherokees, and other tribes that first emigrated beyond the Mississippi, have, for the most part, abandoned the hunter state, and become cultivators of the soil. The improvement in their condition has been rapid, and it is believed that they are now fitted to enjoy the advantages of a simple form of government, which has been submitted to them and received their sanction; and I cannot too strongly urge this subject upon the attention of Congress.

Stipulations have been made with all the Indian tribes to remove them beyond the Mississippi, except with the band of the Wyandotts, the Six Nations in New York, the Menomonees, Mandans and Stockbridges in Wisconsin, and Miamies in Indiana. With all but the Menomonees, it is expected that arrangements for their emigration will be completed the present year. The resistance which has been opposed to their removal by some of the tribes, even after treaties had been made with them to that effect, has arisen from various causes, operating differently on each of them. In most instances they have been instigated to resistance by persons to whom the trade with them and the acquisition of their annuities were important; and in some by the personal influence of interested Chiefs. These obstacles must be overcome; for the Government cannot relinquish the execution of this policy without sacrificing important interests, and abandoning the tribes remaining east of the Mississippi to certain destruction.

The decrease in numbers of the tribes within the limits of the States and Territories has been most rapid. If they be removed, they can be protected from those associations and evil practices which exert so pernicious and destructive an influence over their destinies. They can be induced to labor, and to acquire property, and its acquisition will inspire them with a feeling of independence. Their minds can be cultivated, and they can be taught the value of salutary and uniform laws, and be made sensible of the blessings of free government, and capable of enjoying its advantages. In the possession of property, knowledge, and a good Government, free to give what direction they please to their labor, and sharers in the legislation by which their persons and the profits of their industry are to be protected and secured, they will have an ever present conviction of the importance of union, of peace among themselves, and of the preservation of amicable relations with us. The interests of the United States would also be greatly promoted by freeing the relations between the General and State Governments from what has proved a most embarrassing incumbrance, by a satisfactory adjustment of conflicting titles to lands, caused by the occupation of the Indians, and by causing the resources of the whole country to be developed by the power of the State and General Governments, and improved by the enterprise of a white population.

Intimately connected with this subject is the obligation of the Government to fulfil its treaty stipulations, and to protect the Indians thus assembled "at their new residences from all interruptions and disturbances from any other tribes or nations of Indians, or from any other person or persons whatsoever," and the equally solemn obligation to guard from Indian hostility its own border settlements, stretching along a line of more than one thousand miles. To enable the Government to redeem this pledge to the Indians, and to afford adequate protection to its own citizens, will require the continual presence of a considerable regular force on the frontiers, and the establishment of a chain of permanent posts. Examinations of the country are now making, with a view to decide on the most suitable points for the erection of fortresses and other works of defence, the results of which will be presented to you by the Secretary of War at an early day, together with a plan for the effectual protection of friendly Indians, and the permanent defence of the frontier States.

By the report of the Secretary of the Navy, herewith communicated, it appears that unremitted exertions have been made at the different navy yards to carry into effect all authorized measures for the extension and employment of our naval force. The launching and preparation of the ship of the line Pennsylvania, and the complete repairs of the ships of the line Ohio, Delaware, and Columbus, may be noticed, as forming a respectable addition to this important arm of our national defence. Our commerce and navigation have received increased aid and protection during the present year. Our squadrons in the Pacific and on the Brazilian station have been much increased, and that in the Mediterranean, although small, is adequate to the present wants of our commerce in that sea. Additions have been made to our squadron on the West India station, where the large force under Commodore Dallas has been most actively and efficiently employed in protecting our commerce, in preventing the importation of slaves, and in cooperating with officers of the Army in carrying on the war in Florida.

The satisfactory condition of our naval force abroad leaves at our disposal the means of conveniently providing for a home squadron, for the protection of commerce upon our extensive coast. The amount of appropriations required for such a squadron will be found in the general estimates for the naval service for the year 1838.

The naval officers engaged upon our coast survey have rendered important service to our navigation. The discovery of a new channel into the harbor of New York, through which our largest ships may pass without danger, must afford important commercial advantages to that harbor, and add greatly to its value as a naval station. The accurate survey of George's shoals off the coast of Massachusetts, lately completed, will render comparatively safe a navigation hitherto considered dangerous.

Considerable additions have been made to the number of captains, commanders, lieutenants, surgeons, and assistant surgeons, in the Navy. These additions were rendered necessary, by the increased number of vessels put in commission, to answer the exigencies of our growing commerce.

Your attention is respectfully invited to the various suggestions of the Secretary, for the improvement of the naval service.

The report of the Postmaster General exhibits the progress and condition of the mail service. The operations of the Post Office Department constitute one of the most active elements of our national prosperity, and it is gratifying to observe with what vigor they are conducted. The mail routes of the United States cover an extent of about one hundred and forty-two thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven miles, having been increased about thirty-seven thousand one hundred and three miles within the last two years. The annual mail transportation on these routes is about thirty-six millions two hundred and twenty-eight thousand nine hundred and sixty-two miles, having been increased about ten millions three hundred and fifty-nine thousand four hundred and seventy-six miles within the same period. The number of post offices has also been increased from ten thousand seven hundred and seventy to twelve thousand and ninety-nine, very few of which receive the mails less than once a week, and a large portion of them daily. Contractors and postmasters in general are represented as attending to their duties with most commendable zeal and fidelity.

The revenue of the Department, within the year ending on the thirtieth June last, was four millions one hundred and thirty-seven thousand and fifty-six dollars and fifty-nine cents; and its liabilities accruing within the same time were three millions three hundred and eighty thousand eight hundred and forty-seven dollars and seventy-five cents. The increase of revenue over that of the preceding year was seven hundred and eight thousand one hundred and sixty-six dollars and forty-one cents.

For many interesting details I refer you to the report of the Postmaster General, with the accompanying paper. Your particular attention is invited to the necessity of providing a more safe and convenient building for the accommodation of that Department.

I lay before Congress copies of reports submitted in pursuance of a call made by me upon the heads of Departments, for such suggestions as their experience might enable them to make as to what further legislative provisions may be advantageously adopted to secure the faithful application of public moneys to the objects for which they are appropriated; to prevent their misapplication or embezzlement by those entrusted with the expenditure of them; and generally to increase the security of the Government against losses in their disbursement. It is needless to dilate on the importance of providing such new safeguards as are within the power of legislation to promote these ends; and I have little to add to the recommendations submitted in the accompanying papers.

By law, the terms of service of our most important collecting and disbursing officers in the civil departments are limited to four years, and when reappointed, their bonds are required to be renewed.

The safety of the public is much increased by this feature of the law, and there can be no doubt that its application to all officers entrusted with the collection or disbursement of the public money, whatever may be the tenure of their offices, would be equally beneficial. I therefore recommend, in addition to such of the suggestions presented by the heads of Departments as you may think useful, a general provision, that all officers of the Army or Navy, or in the Civil Department, entrusted with the receipt or payment of public money, and whose term of service is either unlimited or for a longer time than four years, be required to give bonds, with good and sufficient sureties, at the expiration of every such period.

A change in the period of terminating the fiscal year, from the first of October to the first of April, has been frequently recommended, and appears to be desirable.

The distressing casualties in steamboats, which have so frequently happened during the year, seem to evince the necessity of attempting to prevent them, by means of severe provisions connected with their custom-house papers. This subject was submitted to the attention of Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report, and will be again at the present session, with additional details. It will doubtless receive that early and careful consideration which its pressing importance appears to require.

Your attention has heretofore been frequently called to the affairs of the District of Columbia, and I should not again ask it, did not their entire dependence on Congress give them a constant claim upon its notice. Separated by the Constitution from the rest of the Union, limited in extent, and aided by no Legislature of its own, it would seem to be a spot where a wise and uniform system of local government might have been easily adopted. This District, however, unfortunately, has been left to linger behind the rest of the Union; its codes, civil and criminal, are not only very defective, but full of obsolete or inconvenient provisions; being formed of portions of two States, discrepancies in the laws prevail in different parts of the territory, small as it is; and although it was selected as the seat of the General Government, the site of its public edifices, the depository of its archives, and the residence of officers entrusted with large amounts of public property, and the management of public business, yet it has never been subjected to, or received, that special and comprehensive legislation which these circumstances peculiarly demand. I am well aware of the various subjects of greater magnitude and immediate interest that press themselves on the consideration of Congress; but I believe there is not one that appeals more directly to its justice than a liberal, and even generous, attention to the interests of the District of Columbia, and a thorough and careful revision of its local government.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, December 5th, 1837.

Mr. WRIGHT moved for the printing of five thousand copies of the Message, and fifteen hundred copies of the accompanying documents; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRUNDY gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, introduce a bill for the better security of lives and property entrusted to steam vessels.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky than rose and said, that in the absence of the only surviving Senator from Maryland, (whose duty it would have been to have announced the demise of his colleague) the melancholy task would devolve upon him, of detailing to the Senate what already was but too well known, to wit: the lamented death of Governor KENT, who expired on the 24th of last month, aged 69 years. Mr. C. feelingly and eloquently alluded to the long friendship that had subsisted between himself and the distinguished deceased, and spoke of his services to his own State, in her Legislature, in the Executive chair, &c. all which stations he had filled with consummate ability, and with general satisfaction to the people. No one, Mr. C. maintained, had ever brought into the public councils more integrity of purpose, or a greater share of strong discriminating sense. It was true he seldom spoke in debate, but when he did it was always to the purpose, without being ambitious of the ornament of language. Twenty-six years ago Mr. C. entered public life with the deceased in the House of Representatives, since which brief space of time how many things had occurred, how many questions arisen, that were supposed would shake the Confederacy to its very centre? Still he was gratified to find that the stars and stripes floated triumphantly, and the country was marching onward to its high destiny, unchecked in its career. Mr. C. adverted to the private worth of his deceased friend: his mansion was the seat of generous hospitality, and his heart ever replete with kindness; his loss was not only to Maryland, to the Senate, but to the country at large, and to none more than the people of this District, whose firm and zealous friend he had ever been, all of whom would recollect the thrilling appeal made in their behalf not sixty days ago. His place would soon again be filled—ably and respectably filled; but no successor could bring a purer heart or sounder head. It now only remained for them to discharge the last melancholy duties due to departed worth; for which purpose, he would introduce the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in token of respect for the memory of the Hon. J. KENT of Maryland, the Senators wear crape on the arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Senate do now adjourn.

Which resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, December 5, 1837.

Mr. MUHLENBERG, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses had convened, and were ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make, reported that they had performed that duty, and that the President would transmit a Message, in writing, this day at 12 o'clock.

The annual Message of the President was then received by the hands of his private secretary, ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, esq.

The Message having been read by the Clerk,

Mr. HAYNES moved a resolution that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that fifteen thousand copies thereof, with the accompanying documents, and five thousand copies without the documents, be printed for the use of the members of the House.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio moved to amend the motion by limiting the number of copies, with the documents, to ten thousand, and extending the number of the Message alone to ten thousand which, after a few words from Mr. W. and Mr; HAYNES, was disagreed to, and the original resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, December 6.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. GRUNDY asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bill:

A BILL to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole, or in part, by steam.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of all owners of steamboats, or vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, on or before the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, to make a new enrolment of the same, under the existing laws of the United States, and take out from the collector or surveyor of the port, as the case may be, where such vessel is enrolled, a new license, under such conditions as are now imposed by law, and as shall be imposed by this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the owner, master, or captain of any steamboat, or vessel propelled in whole, or in part, by steam, to transport any goods, wares, and merchandise, or passengers, in or upon the bays, lakes, rivers, or other navigable waters of the United States, from and after the said first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, without having first obtained, from the proper officer, a license under the existing laws, and without having complied with the conditions imposed by this act; and for each and every violation of this section, the owner or owners of said vessel shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of five hundred dollars, one-half for the use of the informer; and for which sum or sums the steamboat, or vessel so engaged, shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily, by way of libel, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offence.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the district judge of the United States, within whose district any ports of entry or delivery may be, on the navigable waters, bays, lakes, and rivers of the United States, upon the application of the master or owner of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole, or in part, by steam, to appoint, from time to time, one or more persons skilled and competent to make inspections of such boats and vessels, and of the boilers and machinery employed in the same, whose duty it shall be to make such inspection when called upon for that purpose, and to give to the owner or master of such boat or vessel duplicate certificates of such inspection.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the person or persons who shall be called upon to inspect the hull of any steamboat or vessel, under the provisions of this act, shall, after a thorough examination of the same, give to the owner or master, as the case may be, a certificate, in which shall be stated the age of the said boat or vessel, when and where originally built, and the length of time the same has been running. And he or they shall also state whether, in his or their opinion, the said boat or vessel is sound, and fit to be used for the transportation of freight or passengers; for which service, so performed upon each and every boat or vessel, the inspectors shall each be paid and allowed by said master or owner applying for such inspection the sum of five dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the person or persons who shall be called upon to inspect the boilers and machinery of any steamboat or vessel, under the provisions of this act, shall, after a thorough examination of the same, make a certificate, in which shall be stated the pressure which the said boilers are allowed to carry in steam; and he or they shall moreover provide a suitable hydraulic pump, and, after examining into the state and condition of the boiler or boilers of such boat or vessel, shall test the strength and soundness of said boilers, by applying to the same a hydraulic pressure, equal to three times the pressure that the said boilers are allowed to carry in steam; and if he or they shall be of opinion, after such examination and test, that the said machinery and boilers are sound and fit for use, he or they shall so state, together with the age of said boilers, in the same certificate, and duplicates thereof shall be delivered to the owner or master of such vessel; one of which it shall be the duty of the said master and owner to deliver to the collector or surveyor of the port whenever he shall apply for a license, or for a renewal of a license; the other he shall cause to be posted up, and kept in some conspicus part of said boat, for the information of the public; and, for each and every inspection and test of the boilers so made, each of the said inspectors shall be paid by the said master or owner applying, the sum of dollars.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the owners and masters of steamboats to cause the inspection provided under the fourth section of this act, to be made at least once in every twelve months; and the examination and trial of the strength of the boilers of his boat, required by the fifth section, at least once in every six months; and deliver to the collector or surveyor of the port where his boat or vessel has been enrolled or licensed, the certificate of such inspection; and, on a failure thereof, he or they shall forfeit the license granted to such boat or vessel, and be subject to the same penalty as though he had run said boat or vessel without having obtained such license, to be recovered in like manner.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever the master of any boat or vessel, or the person or persons charged with navigating said boat or vessel, which is propelled in whole or in part by steam, shall stop the motion or headway of said boat or vessel, or when the said boat or vessel shall be stopped for the purpose of discharging or taking in cargo, fuel, or passengers, he or they shall keep the engine of said boat or vessel in motion sufficient to work the pump and give the necessary supply of water, and to keep the steam down in said boiler to what it is when the said boat is under headway, and at the same time shall open the safety-valve, so as to keep the steam down in said boiler to what it was when the said boat or vessel is under headway, under the penalty of two hundred dollars for each and every offence.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the owner and master of every steam vessel engaged in the transportation of freight or passengers, the tonnage of which vessel shall not exceed two hundred tons, to provide and to carry with the said boat or vessel, upon each and every voyage, two long boats or yawls, each of which shall be competent to carry at least twenty persons; and where the tonnage of said vessel shall exceed two hundred tons, it shall be the duty of the owner and master to provide and carry, as aforesaid, not less than four long boats or yawls, of the same or larger dimensions; and for every failure in these particulars, the said master and owner shall forfeit and pay three hundred dollars.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the master and owner of every steam vessel to provide, as a part of the necessary furniture, a suction-hose and fire engine and hose, suitable to be worked on said boat in case of fire, and carry the same upon each and every voyage, in good order; and for a failure to do which, they and each of them, shall forfeit and pay the sum of three hundred dollars.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of a master and pilot of a steamboat, except those navigating tide water, when descending any river or stream in the night, where the descending boat shall come within one half mile of an ascending steamboat, to shut off steam, and permit his boat to float upon the current of the river until the ascending boat shall have passed; and it shall then be the duty of the master, pilot, and owner of the ascending boat to steer clear of the descending boat; and they shall be respectively liable for any damages sustained in consequence of a failure to comply with these provisions.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the master and owner of every steamboat, running between sunset and sunrise, to have two lights suspended, one at the bow, and the other at the stern of his vessel, the former of which shall be at least three feet, and the latter ten feet above the upper deck of the vessel, under the penalty of two hundred dollars.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the penalties imposed by this act, may be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States, in the District or Circuit Court of such district or circuit where the offence shall have been committed, or forfeiture incurred, or in which the owner or master of said vessel may reside, one half to the use of the informer, and the other to the use of the United States.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That every captain, engineer, pilot or other person employed in navigating any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his or their respective duties, the life or lives of any person or persons on board said vessel, may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and upon conviction thereof before any Circuit Court of the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labor for a period not less than two nor more than ten years.

The bill, having been read twice, was referred to a committee consisting of Messrs. GRUNDY, WALL, CLAYTON, BENTON, CALHOUN, WEBSTER, and WALKER, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the Chair appoint the standing committees.

Mr. CLAY said he had no particular feeling on the subject: he had no objection to the course proposed at this time.

Mr. KING of Alabama thought the regular mode of proceeding would be to give notice to amend the rule, if it were desired to get rid of the present mode of appointing committees. Previous to the rule, the Vice President did not appoint the committees; it was the habit for that officer to resign the seat some days before the close of the session, and a chairman to be appointed pro tem.. on whom that duty devolved. It would be recollected that some years ago there was a long and animated discussion on the powers of the Vice President. It was doubted by some whether that officer should be trusted with the authority to call the Senate to order. In the present instance he had no objection to the Vice President appointing the committees, but was unwilling to rescind the rule.

Mr. GRUNDY explained his object to be to save time and trouble, and as his object could only be reached by unanimous consent, he hoped there would be no objection.

Mr. CLAY said he concurred in the views of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HUBBARD moved that the Senate proceed, on to-morrow, to appoint the standing committees.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, on the present occasion, he was for dispensing with the rule, but would be unwilling to rescind it. High as he thought of the occupant of that chair, he was not disposed to vest him with the power to appoint the committees. He concurred, however, with the views of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Grundy) that the mode suggested by him would save time; and as the ballot of last September would furnish a guide, he presumed the mode would be most desirable.

Mr. HUBBARD having withdrawn his motion, the CHAIR was vested with the power of appointing the standing committees, by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. TIPTON gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States and Territories, and for their removal east of the Mississippi;" also, a bill to provide for the relief of Peter Nomer.

Mr NORVELL gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, introduce a bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be designated and marked the boundary line between the State of Michigan and the Territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. LYON gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, bring in a bill granting to the county of Kalamazoo, in the State of Michigan, the right of pre-emption to a quarter section of land, and for other purposes.

Also, a bill to create an additional land office in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would on to-morrow bring in a bill to authorize the President to designate the northern boundary line of the State of Missouri.

Mr. BUCHANAN gave notice that he would on to-morrow introduce a bill to explain and amend the fifth section of the act of the 30th June, 1834, for the better organization of the United States marine corps.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing his annual report on the finances.

December 5, 1837.

In obedience to the "Act supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department," the undersigned respectfully submits the following report:

1. Of the Revenue and Expenditures.

These combined make the total receipts for the year as ascertained and estimated - - 23,499,981 00

With the balance on the 1st of January last, they constitute an aggregate of - - - 69,468,504 86

The expenditures for the first three quarters of the present year, with the like exceptions, are ascertained to have been - - 25,418,916 57

Viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse and miscellaneous	4,024,823 10
Military service, including Florida war, other Indian affairs, fortifications, roads, harbors, pensions, &c.	16,310,208 35
Naval service, including Exploring expedition, gradual improvement, &c.	5,061,865 87
Public debt	22,019 25

See particulars in the document annexed.

The expenditures for the fourth quarter, including those under the recent as well as former appropriations, are, on facts presented by the various Departments, estimated at - - 9,86 ,445 00

Making an aggregate for the year of - - - - 35,281,361 57

This computation would leave in the Treasury, on the first of January, 1838, a balance of - 34,187,143 29

Before adverting to other topics, it will be proper to explain what portion of this balance will not immediately be either available or applicable to public purposes.

The first three instalments of deposits with the several States, which have recently been placed to the credit of the Treasurer for safe-keeping, in conformity to the provisions of the act of 23d June, 1836, are included in it.

As the subsequent law of October 14th, 1837, prohibits the recall of those deposits till otherwise directed by Congress, their large amount will till then be unavailable for any purposes of the General Government. It is $28,101,644 97.

All the funds in the Treasury, which in any former years, from the foundation of the Government, have become unavailable, being chiefly such as are still due from insolvent banks, are likewise embraced in the balance above mentioned. Their amount is not far from $1,100,000.

Another portion consists of what is yet unpaid by the banking institutions, which, during the last spring and summer, suspended specie payments, and thereby, under the imperative provisions of the deposite act, were discontinued as public depositories. The amounts in their possession that have been or probably will, under the act of 16th of October last, be postponed, and will remain unavailable, one-third till July next, one-third till January, 1839, and the residue till July, 1839, are estimated at $3,500,000.

Another sum, not immediately applicable to general purposes, is that part of the amounts transferred to the mint, which being now in active employment for the objects specified in the acts of June 23, 1836, and of January 18, 1837, cannot, without serious inconvenience and some delay, be otherwise used. This sum is about $400,000.

If the aggregate of all these, amounting to $33,101,614 97, be deducted from the balance of $34,187,143 29 above mentioned, the residue of the public money that on the 1st of January next will probably be then both available and applicable to general purposes will be $1,085,498 32.

Perhaps, in strictness, the sum of about $370,797, which was in the Treasury on account of several small trust funds, and was included in the balance on the 1st of January, 1836, ought also to be deducted from what is now considered applicable to public purposes.

Most of it has been, or probably will be, required for the special objects to which it belongs.

Previous to the consideration of other matters connected with the finances, the undersigned would add, that the appropriations which will remain unsatisfied at the end of the year, are estimated at $14,503,483. These, with the exception hereafter mentioned, will be chargeable on that balance, and on the revenue subsequently received.

To prevent misapprehension on this point, it may be proper to observe, that this is the amount of those appropriations considered as unsatisfied, after deducting all the money which has been actually paid to the public claimants, and all the advances which, having been made to the various disbursing officers, are still in their hands for the purpose of being paid over to such claimants. It is supposed that $10,351,091 of the outstanding appropriations will be required to accomplish the objects contemplated by them.

Of the residue, about $361,839 will go to the surplus fund, or in other words, will not be used at all; and it is proposed to apply $3,782,551 in aid of the service of the ensuing year without reappropriation, as explained in the estimates.

It is proper also to explain, that by the act of May 20, 1836, an amount sufficient to pay the principal of the debt due in Holland, on account of the cities of the District of Columbia, equal to $1,500,000, was appropriated, and is still outstanding. But this sum has not been included in the foregoing statement of outstanding appropriations, as the reimbursement of the loan cannot commence, under the stipulations upon which it was contracted, until 1841; and the amount required may be partly reimbursed by the sale of the canal stocks pledged for that purpose.

2. Of the Public Debt.

The payments on account of the funded and unfunded debt since the first December, 1836, have been as follows:

1st. On account of the principal of the funded debt - -		$14,197 26
This leaves unclaimed and undischarged - - -		$327,737 91
Viz: principal -	$76,169 74
Interest, with dividends - -	251,568 17
The latter consisting of the amount due 1st Dec. 1836,	$250,416 00
Add excess of repayments since - -	1,152 17
2d. On the unfunded debt there has been paid, including $199 51 for interest on Treasury notes of 1815, the sum of - - -		$706 66
This leaves the amount of certificates and notes payable on presentation - - - -		$36,933 40
Viz: certificates issued for claims during the revolutionary war, and registered prior to 1798	$27,293 31
Treasury notes issued during the late war, - -	5,320 00
Certificates of Mississippi stock - -	4,320 09

3. Estimates of the revenue and expenditures for the year 1838.

The receipts into the Treasury from the ordinary sources during 1838, may, under the explanations and conditions hereafter mentioned, be estimated at - - - - - $31,959,787

Viz: Customs, including about four millions, which is expected to be collected on postponed duties - -	$17,500,000
Lands, including one and a half million for estimated sales under another pre-emption law, if one passes, and of new tracts brought into market - -	5,000,000
Second bond of United States Bank with interest due in September, 1838 - -	2,293,121
First instalment of the principal due from the former deposite banks in July, 1838, estimated at	1,666,666
Interest on the same, with incidental and miscellaneous receipts	300,000
New issues of Treasury notes in 1838 - -	5,700,000

These, and the estimated balance of $1,085,498, which will be in the Treasury on the first of January, 1838, available and applicable to public purposes, constitute an aggregate of - - - - 33,045,285

The expenditures for the year 1838, including the redemption of the Treasury notes, which may be paid in for public dues, or become reimbursable within that year, are estimated at - - - - - $31,926,892

Thus the new appropriations called for are - -	20,523,249
Viz: Civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous -	$3,172,885
Military service, etc. -	11,664,612
Naval service, etc. -	5,685,752
The permanent appropriations for the service of 1838, made by former acts are - -	2,262,000

For the details of new and permanent appropriations, reference may be had to the estimates.

Appropriations expected to be made by Congress beyond the estimates submitted - -	$1,000,000
These new and permanent appropriations amount to -	$23,785,249
The outstanding appropriations at the end of this year, after deducting what will go to the surplus fund, are computed at -	14,141,643
All the appropriations, then, which are chargeable to 1839, constitute an aggregate of -	37,926,892
Of these, it is supposed that not over eleven millions will remain outstanding at the end of the year, and consequently that the expenditures on account of the whole will, in 1838, be about - -	26,926,892
Add to this for redemption of Treasury notes by purchase, and by receipt of them for public dues—they not being reissuable -	5,000,000
Making an aggregate of the whole equal to - - - -	$31,926,892

The balance that will thus be left available, and applicable to public purposes on the 31st of December, 1838, is estimated at $1,118,393.

In the fluctuating condition of our receipts and expenditures, it may appear, before the close of the present session, that results are likely to happen essentially different from some of these calculations.

But it must at present be very questionable whether the receipts in 1838 will exceed the expenditures, so as to produce any surplus, which can be deposited with the States for safe-keeping on the 1st of January, 1839, as required by the existing laws. On the contrary, any considerable departure from the estimates, either by increasing the appropriations, or reducing the receipts, or by paying in for public dues a larger amount of Treasury notes, will necessarily create a deficiency. Little certainty, therefore, can be attained in any calculations on these points, till further facts are developed concerning the revival of commerce, the probability of a speedy improvement in the currency, and the success in effecting, as fast as is compatible with the public interests, that reduction in the appropriations which, in the present, as well as prospective state of the Treasury, is, it may be presumed, anxiously desired by all.

4. Exports and Imports in 1837.

The value of the exports and imports during the year which ended on the 30th of September last, may be seen, accompanied by some interesting details, in the annexed table. The exports are ascertained and estimated to have been $116,906,069.

Of these, about $95,183,199 were of domestic, and $21,722,861 of foreign origin.

They show, since the previous year, a diminution in the former of $11,733,481, and in the latter of only $23,499.

The decrease in the value of domestic exports has been occasioned chiefly by the great fall in the price of cotton during the last spring. They would otherwise have been very large. The exports of foreign merchandise have been prevented from falling much below their former amount by the commercial embarrassments of the times. These, particularly in the last quarter, led to an export of foreign articles, unusual in proportion to the imports, for the double purpose of obtaining the drawback on many of them in specie, and of discharging the large debt due abroad.

The value of the imports for the same year was $140,852,980.

This is $49,127,055 less than the value of those during the previous year.

The imports during the last quarter ending September 30th, were only $23,829,611, or at the rate of but $91,318,444 a year.

Perhaps a stronger illustration could not exist of the extravagant over-trading during 1836, than the fact, now officially ascertained, that the imports, which, in a natural condition of business, should be less than those of 1837, were nearly fifty millions larger, and were about one hundred millions beyond the rate of imports during the last quarter.

The exports during that quarter were $19,159,034, being $13,105,510 of domestic origin, and $6,052,524 of foreign growth. By this result, it will be gratifying to see that the imports, though diminished, were not all needed for home consumption, and that a greater proportion of them than in the former quarters has been sent abroad to reduce the foreign debt. Yet the whole exports were smaller than many anticipated. They have also very unexpectedly been $3,533,313 less in amount than the imports during the same quarter. But if freights, commissions, and profits, as well as remittances in stocks of various kinds, are taken into computation, the probabilities are, that the foreign debt, so far from having been increased within that period, has been lessened some millions, but not to so great an extent as most persons have supposed. In the last report on the finances, some suggestions were made, which further experience has served to verify, respecting the influence which the sudden fall in the price of cotton had exerted during the year in producing commercial embarrassments, as well as a diminution in the value of our exports.

It may be useful to advert a moment to the unusual effect upon both of those subjects, caused by the fluctuations in another article.

In seasons of common crops, and in times when, under the guidance of ordinary prudence, industry was directed more to the cultivation of the soil, the United States were accustomed, under the blessing of Providence, to receive, rather than pay, large sums for the great necessary of life. For a series of many years, the value of the grain and flour imported did not exceed a few thousand dollars, while that exported was, on an average, quite $6,000,000. Sometimes it exceeded even $14,000,000, and so late as 1833, '34, and '35, amounted to nearly $5,000,000 annually. But in the year ending September 30th, 1837, the exports of them fell off nearly a million, while the imports were augmented in value to the unprecedented amount of more than four and a half millions.

This revulsion, so great and so sudden, from bringing home a small amount to importing so many millions' worth of products, mostly for a single purpose, and that one so important in domestic economy as bread stuffs, was of itself sufficient to create a severe shock. From whatever cause the necessity of it may have happened, the result conveys warnings, which it is believed have recently exerted a salutary influence in aiding to restore a judicious system of agriculture, and to promote an increased attention to habits of productive industry.

A moment's reflection on the detailed effects of the high prices, which attended the revulsion, will show, that they and the burdensome change of five or six millions in our exports and imports, must, when united, have affected the pecuniary difficulties of the country, and, indirectly, its trade and currency, much more sensibly than most people have imagined. Besides the grain which is distilled, or employed in the arts, or consumed by domestic animals, it is believed that, on an average, one pound of flour or meal per day to each person is used for bread stuffs alone.

The whole quantity for a population of 15,000,000, would at that rate be nearly 5,500,000,000 pounds a year. At the price of three cents per pound for wheat flour, and only one and a half cents per pound for meal from the cheaper varieties of grain, which is not far from the average of 1834 and 1835, the cost for bread alone, (if only one-half the poulation used wheat flour, and the rest materials less costly,) would be about $124,000,000.

But the average price to consumers during the past year was increased in most places quite eighty per cent. Whether this great rise should be attributed to short crops, to an undue portion of labor bestowed upon the production of other articles, to depreciation in the value of the circulating medium, in consequence of excessive issues of paper, or to all these causes combined, it seems to be clear, that the increase in the cost of bread alone exceeded $100,000,000

If only half of the whole population not raising their own grain, were obliged to purchase it at such an enhanced price, the new tax imposed on that class alone, on account of their bread, would exceed $50,000,000.

This addition to their burdens was nearly seven dollars per head; and when for this no remuneration was made to many persons, as there was only to some, by higher prices obtained for their labors and merchandise exchanged, the increase alone was four times as much as the average tax imposed by means of all the great duties on foreign merchandise. On the present occasion, the undersigned would forbear from entering further into the consideration of various other matters connected with this interesting subject. But when the influence of it upon different portions of the country is traced into some of its numerous bearings and carefully weighed, new topics of inquiry are presented, which will be found to have an intimate connection not only with the value of some of our staple exports, but in other respects with the vital prosperity of large portions of the Union.

5. Further explanations as to the Revenue and Expenditures for 1837, and the effect upon them by laws passed at the late special session.

It may be interesting to Congress to have a few more details concerning the receipts and expenditures of the current year.

The receipts within it have been diminished by recent legislation over four millions. Had the duties not been postponed, the revenue from all sources, after deducting the expenses of collection and other charges, usually imposed on it, would not, in the aggregate, have differed materially from the estimates formed by the Department in December last.

The receipts, during the current half of the year, have also thus far corresponded with the views presented by it at the late session, except that the postponement of duties, subsequently authorized by Congress, has not been so uniformly accepted as was anticipated, and a portion of the current expenses of collection, including debentures and bounties, has under a new law, been paid from the Treasury, instead of being deducted as formerly from the accruing revenue, before it goes into the Treasury.

It should also be explained, that the estimates of receipts for any particular quarter or year, though made accurately, will often vary from the subsequent official statements; because the money is not carried by warrant upon the books of the Register, till after it is placed in some public depository, or actually paid out by the collecting officer on special drafts.

In ordinary times the results would not be much changed by this circumstance. But during fluctuations, such as have characterized the last two or three years, the difference caused by it may occasionally extend to some millions. Thus large sums will be technically carried into the Treasury in the last quarter of 1837, and stand on the books credited to that quarter, when, in fact, the money was collected, and subject to the orders of the Treasurer, in the first half of the year.

The expenditures have not yet essentially varied from the amount anticipated in September. In order to defray them it was then supposed to be necessary, under the existing laws and liabilities, to postpone the fourth instalment of deposites with the States, or adopt some other auxiliary measure. Experience since has confirmed the opinion that, under those laws, it could not have been placed in the custody of the States, except in funds and in a manner very inconvenient, as well as with consequences requiring an immediate recal of other deposites with the States, which would have been exceedingly embarrassing to the finances of both them and the General Government.

The postponement of that instalment, therefore, afforded great relief to all concerned, and left the resources of the Treasury entirely at liberty to be applied in the necessary discharge of the appropriations made by Congress.

Those resources would have been sufficient for that purpose, had no further legislation taken place. But the delay which was afterwards granted beyond the year for the payment of almost all the duties, and the still longer delay which was proffered to the former deposite banks, and accepted by several of them, for the adjustment of what they owed to the United States, gave rise to the necessity for a temporary issue of Treasury notes. The Department, with the aid of them and its remaining resources, has, notwithstanding those indulgences to the public debtors, been enabled to meet the great demands upon it with punctuality, and in a manner which, considering the severe embarrassments of the times, is believed to have generally proved satisfactory.

It now appears probable that, during the next year, means will be possessed, without any permanent loans, recall of former deposites, or increase of taxes, sufficient to redeem seasonably the Treasury notes that become payable, as well as to meet all the ordinary appropriations.

Some difficulties have arisen in the construction of the laws granting further delay to the merchants and the former deposite banks; but they have thus far been enforced under a liberal view of their object, and in this manner are supposed to have afforded sensible relief, not only to those immediately interested, but, through them, to the people at large.

In respect to the act for settling with the banks, some of them since September have paid over all the public money which then stood to the credit of the Treasurer. Others are supposed to have executed bonds according to one of its provisions, and several are preparing to do so with a view to receive further indulgence. The remainder are expected to discharge, without suit or bond, the amounts they respectively owe, as may, from time to time, be needed to meet the public exigencies.

The payments which will probably be longest postponed, will chiefly be from some institutions situated in the West and Southwest. The accumulation happening to be there, not by transfer from other quarters, but by receipts on the spot from the sales of public land, it was unavoidable under the existing laws. Nor could it, during the excessive over-actions of the times in banking and speculations of all kinds, have been lessened any further than was attempted by issuing the specie circular—and by refraining to offer any new tracts at public sale, unless laws had been passed, as was recommended, to restrict the sales to actual settlers, or, as since proposed, to authorize the receipt of payments elsewhere.

But a suitable portion of the money, after being received in the West and Southwest, was in due season put under transfer to the Atlantic States. In May last, the stoppage of specie payments, and the consequent discontinuance of most of the public depositories, prevented many of the drafts for remittance, which were then outstanding, from being executed. In order, therefore, to discharge satisfactorily the current payments of appropriations, and the July transfers to the States on the Atlantic, it became indispensable to draw larger amounts from the banks situated in the latter quarter of the country. While this afforded a longer indulgence to the West and Southwest in the use of the surplus which had accumulated there, it is gratifying to reflect, that all just cause of jealousy has been removed, and any sectional benefits from delay in paying over the public money equalized in a great degree, as the Eastern, Northern, and Middle States were at the same time allowed to enjoy a like indulgence, through their merchants rather than banks, in the use of the money due to the Government for duties instead of lands.

In the execution of the other prominent measure adopted at the last session, which permitted an issue of Treasury notes, the Department has not yet been required by the public exigencies to make a large one.

Nor is any occasion to keep out a great amount of these notes anticipated. Entertaining such opinions concerning the currency as have been formerly expressed by the undersigned, any event would be greatly deprecated which should lead to a permanent emission of such notes, or any kind of Government paper, except for temporary purposes, and in small amounts, unless it be founded entirely on specie, and redeemable under circumstances similar to those explained at the last session.

The range of the financial operations of the present year has been very extensive. If the receipts from postages, from the sales of the Chickasaw lands, from foreign indemnities, and all other trusts, were included in the condensed statement of the finances, the entire amount carried into the Treasury during the year, with the balance on the 1st of January last, would exceed $79,000,090. But without entering here into explanations in detail under those heads, it will appear, in the appropriate reports, that so far as connected with this department, an attempt has been made to conduct the whole in as close conformity as possible to the acts of Congress. Notwithstanding the unusual magnitude and difficulties of the duties devolved upon the Treasury Department during the year, it has scrupulously endeavored not to assume any doubtful powers. Nor, as a mere Executive branch of the Government, has it felt justified, under circumstances or reasons however plausible, to permit the public funds to be employed otherwise than on objects and in a manner that appeared to be clearly warranted by the limitations of the laws, and those principles strictly applicable to mere financial operations.

6. Explanatory remarks on the estimates of receipts and expenditures for 1838

The receipts from duties during the next year have been estimated quite four millions higher, in consequence of the recent act of Congress, bringing within it the payment of a still larger amount, which originally fell due in the present year.

Independent of that circumstance, it is not considered probable, that they would much exceed $13,500,000. The reasons for this opinion are, that a further reduction of two-tenths of the present duties which remain at a rate of more than twenty per cent. takes effect after the 31st instant, and that the depression of trade during the last half of the year has been severe, and is likely to continue so for some time. The actual imports during the quarter ending in September having been only at the rate of about ninety millions annually; and the average imports from 1824 to 1830, before the commencement of the late excesses, having been about eighty-two millions, it is deemed safe to compute that they will not in 1838 exceed forty per cent. on that average, or about one hundred and fifteen millions. On the supposition that one-half of them will be free, and the nett duties received on the other half will not exceed twenty-five per cent. the amount paid into the Treasury for them within the year, independent of the postponment above-named, would not vary much from thirteen and a half millions.

The receipts from the sales of public lands have likewise been estimated one million and a half more than they would have been, if considerable sums were not expected to be derived from the increased sales of tracts newly brought into market, and from the anticipated passage of another preemption law. It is supposed that this last measure, deemed so important by many of the pioneers on our frontiers, whose hardy pursuits, exposures, and various privations, are often so useful to the country at large, will meet with fewer objections, if it be more strictly guarded and limited than others of the kind have heretofore been. Those objections will perhaps be lessened still further, if it is considered that the revenue to be at once derived from the measure, would conduce much to the efficiency of our fiscal operations, and that from the experience of many years, the nett receipts from the sales of public land are not likely ever to surpass, in any great degree, the minimum price per acre, which is paid by those having preemptions.

Without the passage of some such law, or the offer of large quantities of new lands, the undersigned is unable to perceive any sound reason for estimating the sales very differently from what has been done by him for some years past. Public sales cannot be needed for cultivation much beyond three millions of acres a year, while so many private lands are in the market as have been bought for resale within the last three years. If a demand should exist for more than that quantity, except the gradual increase with the increase of our population, it would probably be the result of causes accidental, or transient, or of new legislation.

It may be useful to add a few general illustrations of the reasons for some of the small estimates now submitted, and of the intrinsic difficulties in attaining much certainty concerning them during crises of over-action and revulsion like the past and the present. Whether they occur from over-trading, over-banking, or other excesses, and the depressions consequent from them, the financial history of this country shows strikingly how much our system of business is exposed to them, and the astonishing fluctuations they produce.

During the two years before the revulsions in commerce in 1819, and including that year, the sales of public land exceeded the unusual amount of nearly thirty millions of dollars, while in the three following years they fell to only about four millions, or less than one-seventh. The system being changed from credit to cash, may have co-operated in producing this result; though, at the same time, the minimum price per acre was reduced, in order, in some degree, to counteract the effect of that change. In the second and third quarters of 1836, also, the receipts from the sales of land increased to nearly fourteen millions of dollars, while in the corresponding quarters of 1837, they diminished to only two and one-fourth millions.

In truth, the number of acres sold since the first of January, 1835, has reached the extraordinary quanty of thirty-seven and a half millions, and thus have the sales so widely departed from all precedents, and every ordinary principle of calculation, as to equal in less than three years, however incredible the fact may appear, the whole made during the forty-five years which had before elapsed from the adoption of the Constitution.

Similar fluctuations have happened in the amount of our imports, and consequently in the amount of duties.

Thus, in 1808, the imports, affected by restrictive legislation, and other causes, fell off at the unprecedented rate of over eighty millions of dollars; while in 1815, influenced by the transition from war to peace, an increase of imports equal to one hundred millions, and an increase of duties from customs alone equal to nearly thirty millions occurred in a single year. It may be remembered, also, that from 1818 to 1822, the vibrations from mere commercial causes were almost as sudden as those incident to war or any great changes in legislation.

Thus the imports diminished from over one hundred and twenty-one millions in 1818, to only about eighty-seven millions in 1819, and to only about one-half, or sixty-two and a half millions, in 1821. They fell nearly sixty millions in value in only three years, and, in the last two of them, the revenue from duties diminished also more than one-third. It deserves special notice that these were years embracing a period of peace, of free commerce, and the full operation of the United States Bank. The price of cotton also fell, during the same period, over one-half, and the price of flour from ten to only four and five dollars a barrel. The extent of these vacillations has been so unexpected at some periods, that, in 1816, the receipts from customs exceeded the estimates by nearly fifteen millions of dollars, though the latter were made by Mr. Dallas several months after the relations of peace had been restored, and its influence experienced.

The imports during the last quarter of the commercial year just ended have furnished another signal illustration on this branch of the subject. As before mentioned, they so fluctuated that, if continued for twelve months at their reduced rate, the falling off would nearly equal the extraordinary amount of one hundred millions of dollars.

Some further explanations concerning the estimates for the expenditures may be useful.

The addition of between two and three millions which has been made on account of the large amount of appropriations, exceeding fourteen millions, left outstanding and chargeable to the next year, will be found reasonable, when it is remembered that the average amount annually left has not, in general, exceeded six millions. The propriety of adding, also, the contingent sum of at least one million to cover appropriations made by Congress beyond the estimates, has been so fully tested by the experience of several years past, that the correctness of the measure may be considered no longer doubtful. But the usual excess of appropriations thus made by Congress is not imputed by the undersigned to any special inattention or extravagance. This item has of late years been introduced into the estimates, because it was found that new treaties, hostilities, or other events, often require the Departments, before the session is closed, to offer estimates for further appropriations. Sometimes commendable measures, of a public as well as private character, originate in Congress, and, consequently, are not included in the estimates of the Departments, but which justify additional appropriations. Sometimes, likewise, acts are passed for an indefinite amount, which involve in the end an expenditure far beyond what was, or could by any ordinary foresight be anticipated, during the passage of them.

The estimate as to the receipt of Treasury notes has been placed at five millions of dollars, or only a little beyond the amount which falls due and is obliged to be redeemed within the year.

But as all of those issued, whether due or not, have been made by law receivable at any time for public debts, and the right to reissue them even during the year is prohibited, it must be manifest, that the receipts or redemption of them will be likely much to exceed that amount, and to produce to that extent a deficiency, if the banks do not resume specie payments, so as to aid in supplying a sound currency to pay into the Treasury, instead of them; or unless the prohibition to reissue them during the year be removed.

The whole expenditures during 1838, for new appropriations, have been estimated lower than those of last year, on account of the reduced wants of the Government, and a wish to economise wherever the public interests will permit.

It is believed, that if wars, or other expensive contingencies, do not intervene, the expenditures can gradually be diminished till their average in ordinary times shall not exceed seventeen or eighteen millions of dollars annually.

The expectations of such a reduction, which were formerly cherished and explained by the undersigned, were likely to be realized, when an extraordinary increase in the revenue induced Congress to adopt the system of completing sooner many public works of great usefulness, and of effecting an earlier extinguishment of Indian titles with a speedier removal of the Aboriginals beyon the Mississippi.

The charges on the Treasury, during each of the last two years, for these objects, as well as for grants to the District of Columbia, and for expenses of the Florida war, have nearly equalled the whole excess of expenditures in each year above that average. As the surplus has ceased to exist which was one chief inducement to any increases of expenditure except on account of the Florida war, and was, at the same time, one ground for their justification, it seems probable that all the suitable reductions can soon be accomplished. A rigid regard to economy, and sound principles of public policy, if persisted in, will easily save the country from the burthen of a national debt; and without any wastefulness in expenditure, will enable it to sustain every valuable institution in a vigorous condition.

Should some questions unfortunately occur which involve national honor, or are intimately connected with public liberty, any sacrifice of money within the constitutional powers of the Government, that may be necessary to the security of those great objects, can then be made from our ample financial resources, without producing any general distress, or departing from those habits of frugality in public, as well as private life, which are so indispensable to sustain republican institutions.

7. On the banks, and other matters connected with the collection, keeping, and disbursement of the public money.

The views of this Department upon several topics connected with the collection, keeping, and disbursement of the public money have been so recently presented, that only a few additional remarks concerning them will be offered. The condition of the banks was one of the most prominent of those topics. To prevent any misapprehension, it may be proper to repeat the assurance, that no wish has ever been felt to interfere improperly with those institutions. While chartered and used solely for local purposes, the regulation and control of them are supposed to belong exclusively to the States. But their organization, as well as responsibilities, and an early reform in both, became questions of great importance to the Treasury, when connected with them, as heretofore, in the capacity of either public depositories or the sources of a portion of the currency received for public dues. Experience for several months past is full of instructive lessons on these points. Indeed, every crisis in our pecuniary affairs has tended greatly to strengthen the conviction that evils exist in banking in this country, which are inherent in the system, as well as in the administration of it. A wide departure has been made from the original principles of having its issues of paper rest on a foundation consisting of specie alone, and that used in deposite chiefly for commercial objects. While regulated substantially in this manner, banking was not only an instrument of convenience to trade, and sometimes to fiscal operations, but safe in practice, and not inconsistent with any sound theory as to currency. But when the system is changed, so that the paper issued rests like mere bills of exchange, almost exclusively on credit, and that credit not always guarded in the best practicable methods, such a currency, however profitable or convenient to those interested, must become exposed to many of the vicissitudes of commerce, forfeit most of its original character as the actual representative of money, and lose its security in a considerable degree as a circulating medium for the use of either the community or the Government, Under such circumstances, that calamity, to a greater or less extent, will often ensue, which happened during the last spring.

As the failure to redeem their bills in specie, then extended to most of the banks that had been employed in the capacity of public depositories, it became proper to explain to Congress, at its late session, the injurious influence of the measure on the financial operations of the Government, and the losses thus caused to its numerous creditors among the various classes of society, with those preventives, as well as guarantees against them hereafter, which seemed appropriate and feasible. Perhaps it is not now necessary to enter further into that subject in order to discharge the painful duties which such a state of things imposed upon the head of this Department. In consequence of what occurred, Congress passed an act to facilitate a settlement with the deposite banks, which, as before observed, is in the course of execution, and which is the only new measure of legislation adopted by both Houses that indicates the future relations intended to be preserved with these institutions. But as the condition of most of the banks throughout the United States, since the suspension of specie payments, might have an important bearing on this and other subjects connected with fiscal concerns, an extensive correspondence has been opened in relation to it.

The result, so far as their affairs can be ascertained, with much accuracy, will now be presented. Their condition, as a whole, does not appear to have altered very materially during the year, in respect to the relative proportion of all their immediate means and liabilities, but in several other respects the changes have been essential. One portion of the new returns which have been procured, is dated near the 1st of January, 1837, a few months before the suspension of specie payments, and another portion, classed separately, is dated a few months subsequent to the suspension. Within that time the whole discounts appear to have been reduced only about twenty millions of dollars, still being over five hundred millions. The nett or active circulation of bank paper is supposed to have been curtailed but sixteen or seventeen millions, leaving over ninety-nine millions. The deposites have been lessened thirty-six, but they are still in the large amount of ninety-three millions of dollars, and the specie on hand has decreased more than eight millions of dollars. How much of these data depends on estimates, and how much on actual returns, can be seen in the tables annexed. The second one, though less full, contains some striking evidence on the comparative and very different ability to sustain specie payments in different quarters of the country, as well as on the different exertions which have been made to resume them. From its contents, the unreasonableness mentioned in September last seems still more apparent of expecting the exertions of many, and the duties of the whole, to wait in these respects on the means or convenience of a few.

These returns exhibit some improvement in the affairs of the banks in the aggregate, as the sources of much of the currency. But they furnish at the same time new confirmation of the great excesses in issues, which in some places, notwithstanding numerous cautions, had before been indulged in. They show, too, that the whole reduction in the active circulation, had not at their dates, equalled by nearly twenty millions the amount which, as long ago as last December, it was computed by this Department would be required to restore the paper currency generally to a safe basis, and make it, with the specie in actual use, bear a just proportion to the real wants of the community. But the continued reduction in circulation and deposites which, since August, has probably been persisted in by several of the banks, must, if effected in the most judicious course, by a curtailment of their discounts, have served, by this time, to place those institutions in a more eligible condition to resume specie payments. Where this reduction has been accompanied by any considerable increase rather than diminution of specie, the ability to resume, and with proper restrictions and care hereafter to sustain, specie payments must approach very near the point requisite to insure public confidence. Because the rate of foreign exchange has been so far reduced, as to be near the real par in specie, and seldom to permit the export of it to advantage, and the liabilities of the banks to the Government, which otherwise might press upon them in case of a resumption, are in most cases either discharged, or in a train of postponement, or inconsiderable in amount.

The recent imports and exports of specie have an important bearing in forming a correct opinion on these questions. The imports appearing on the custom-house books have, during the year ending September 30, 1837, been ascertained by the weekly returns to be $10,954,332; while the exports during the same period have been only $6,714,990. Other returns, when all received, may slightly differ. Undoubtedly the whole actual imports and exports, whether on the books or not, have exceeded these amounts; and though the excess has probably been greater on the part of the exports, yet these last cannot safely be computed to have gone beyond the imports.

The invariable laws that govern trade and the currency have thus indicated a healthier condition of our system than would otherwise be inferred from the general and protracted suspension of specie payments by most of the banking institutions.

The addition of about forty-five millions of specie, which, within four years past, has been made to the quantity that was before in the United States, may have enabled persons to increase bank capital and bank issues in places where the restrictions on the latter were loose. But that the natural tendency of it, as supposed by some, has been to derange the currency, as well as the commerce, not only of these States, but of Europe, is an opinion that cannot have much foundation in any safe principle of political economy, when it is considered that the currency of Europe, in specie alone, is computed to exceed eleven hundred millions of dollars, and of the world, to be nearly two thousand millions, and its gold and silver, in various uses, to equal from five to seven thousand millions. It is worthy of notice, also, that the addition of specie above mentioned, though large compared with the amount previously possessed, has hardly equalled the nett profits on the single article of cotton shipped from this country in the years 1835 and '36.

But whatever obstacles may still exist to a general resumption of specie payments, few can doubt that as early an one as can be sustained is urgently demanded by the strongest obligations of morals and law; by justice to the public creditors, consisting of numerous contractors, mechanics, laborers and pensioners, as well as officers; and by all the true interests of the people, whether in private affairs or in the concerns of their Government. In both are their interests in this respect inseparably connected; and in both, do they severely suffer by depreciated paper—as the tax thus imposed finally reaches the community in either case, and usually in a ratio quite equal to the rate of discount on the paper below specie. The powers of the General Government to hasten such a resumption are circumscribed to the use of some constitutional authority of a restrictive or penal character, such as taxation, or a bankrupt law when the suspension appears in its origin or long continuance to be clearly unjustifiable; or, when otherwise, to the furnishing of some incidental aid in the exercise of other rights. The latter course is the only one, which, during the present suspension, it has yet appeared proper to adopt. In pursuance of it, the mode of making most of the public payments since May last; the manner in which the July instalment was placed with the States; the delay granted for more than a year in paying the fourth one, giving thereby a temporary aid, as substantial to several of the banks as to the Treasury, and the liberal indulgence offered to them, for the balances still due to the United States, were all measures of relief, and have contributed to strengthen their immediate means for the resumption of specie payments. Beyond such incidental aid to some of the banks, with which may have existed fiscal connections, not generally equaling one twentieth of the whole number, it is doubtful whether the General Government, however solicitous to see that object accomplished, would be able, constitutionally, to provide any special assistance in effecting it. It must be manifest to all who examine the subject dispassionately, that either the possession by a few banks of the usual small amount of public deposites, liable at any time to be recalled, or the receipt of their bills for public dues when redeemed in specie on demand, and frequently presented for that purpose, must often be a check rather than an aid—and prove of doubtful advantage in promoting a resumption among the whole number. It must be equally manifest, that the chief reliance of banks to perform their legal obligations, must, like that of individuals, always be placed on their own resources.

The highest considerations require that these should be regulated by all suitable legislative restraints, and employed with foresight, moderation, and the strongest sense of justice to the public, to sustain on a par with specie the currency they issue, and which, except on the condition it should be thus sustained, the public would never have confided to them a power almost sovereign to create.

It has been a source of some inconvenience, under the existing laws, that none of the banks have resumed specie payments since the late session, which are known to be willing and competent, under all the provisions of the deposite act, to be selected as fiscal agents. Several, which are paying specie, have expressly declined taking the public money, under those provisions. The mode of keeping it is, therefore, imperfect without further legislation. Every exertion within the powers now existing has been made to increase the security of it; and the department has for several months been enabled, by unremitted attention, to conduct successfully the temporary arrangements which are in force for that purpose. But till Congress shall sanction some new system, or revive the whole of the old one in force before 1836, or till specie payments are resumed, and the deposite act materially amended, these arrangements must be greatly enlarged by doubtful constructions, or remain exposed to several of the inconveniences incident to all these plans, without some of the remedial powers and advantages of either.

On the practicability of keeping the public money under new legislative provisions, without using banks at all as fiscal agents, the views of this department have been so recently explained, as to render a repetition of them unnecessary. It was the endeavor of the undersigned to present with impartiality the advantages and disadvantages of both systems; to show the expediency, if not the necessity, of the new one, in the existing unfortunate attitude of most of the banks; and to leave the result, where it is now left, to the superior wisdom of Congress.

A similar course was pursued in respect to the kind of money to be received for public dues, which he regarded, and still considers, a question entirely distinct, though often viewed by others as inseparable.

While offering reasons why bank paper was occasionally more convenient than coin as a currency for the large and distant purposes of commerce, and why the exclusive use of coin for all kinds of payments could not at present be introduced, and might never be desirable,—it was insisted, that so far as it should be employed in public affairs, and with whatever limitations as to time or amount, care must be exercised to adhere to the spirit of the Constitution and the first principles of political economy, by always requiring it, when and where taken, to be equivalent in value to specie.

This opinion was not conceived in any hostility to the true principles of credit, or to banking institutions duly regulated, or to a sound currency for the people. On the contrary, it is supposed to favor them all, and to be indispensable to uphold the true standard of value for property and labor throughout the country, to sustain the just obligation of contracts, and, in a pecuniary view, preserve the real worth of all private as well as public rights.

The ensuing session will, by its length, probably afford ample time to place our whole financial system on a proper basis. Nothing new will be required, except such measures as are rendered necessary to its efficiency, by the changes which have arisen from the final discharge of the national debt, and by the more fluctuating character of the receipts and expenditures, as well as by the recen suspension of specie payments on the part of most of the deposite banks.

The undersigned, feeling a deep conviction that the fiscal affairs of the Government cannot hereafter, under any system, be managed with such facility and vigor as the public service requires, without adopting several legal provisions heretofore recommended, hopes to be excused for briefly inviting the attention of Congress once more to a few of them.

First. That a contingent authority be given to some appropriate officer, to invest safely any considerable surpluses which shall casually occur in the receipts beyond the expenditures, and to dispose of such investments when deficiencies may happen which require it.

Second. That a limited power be granted to issue Treasury notes for mere temporary purposes, in case of deficiencies, when no such surpluses exist, and to redeem them as excesses may happen. Beside other obvious reasons in favor of such a provision, it would enable the Department to administer the finances with at least two or three millions less in the Treasury at any one time than would otherwise be necessary. In fixing the system on a durable basis, the grant of both these powers seems expedient, as a provident arrangement, whatever course may at any future time be pursued in regard to the recall of the present large deposites placed by the General Government with the States.

Third. That the additional duties of general depositories be imposed on all receivers and collectors of public money, and on the Mint and its branches, as well as the Treasurer at the seat of Government, under such regulations, in respect to disbursements and transfers, as have before been indicated. This change might judiciously include an authority to employ separate depositories, special or general, individual or corporate, under the circumstances and responsibilities suggested at the late session, if the amount in possession of any collecting officer should generally exceed what is well secured by official bonds.

Whether these provisions be, in the discretion of Congress, left to constitute the whole system of keeping and disbursing the public money, or only a part of it, they form a change which would undoubtedly be very salutary.

Fourth. That permission be given to receive payment in advance for the public lands, at such places as this Department may appoint, for the convenience of both the Treasury and the community.

Fifth. The extension of the warehouse system, in connection with requiring all duties on imports to be paid when the goods are taken out for consumption, is another change which, though less urgent in some points of view, is very desirable in respect to the collection and security of the most important portion of the public revenue. In the consideration of these propositions, the present condition of the finances and of the country is a circumstance of the first and most decisive importance. We are without any national debt to absorb and regulate surpluses, or any adequate supply of banking institutions which provide a sound currency for general purposes by paying specie on demand, or which are in a situation fully to command confidence, for keeping, disbursing, and transferring the public funds in a satisfactory manner. It will not, then, be a matter of surprise, that the undersigned, feeling daily and most sensibly the difficulties, as well as great responsibility, of conducting the concerns of the Treasury without the adoption of these measures, should press them upon the earliest consideration of Congress, with an earnestness and perseverance that might otherwise not appear justifiable.

8. Several miscellaneous matters.

Occasion will be taken during the session to present separate reports concerning the Mint, the Land Office, and some other subjects under the general superintendence of this department.

A revision of the number and compensation of custom-house officers has for some years received the attention of Congress.

The public welfare, as well as equal justice to various incumbents, appears urgently to require further legislation upon this subject at the first practicable opportunity.

The recent law, postponing the payment of duties, has for some time deprived several of those officers of a great part of their compensation, and new legislation is required not only for temporary relief, but to remunerate the losses which must happen in many instances in case of death, resignation or expiration of office.

The reorganization of the Treasury Department, so as to empower one of the present Comptrollers to act solely in the capacity of Commissioner of the Customs, devolving on him, also, all the other appropriate business of the marine hospitals, revenue cutters, and light-house establishments, was on a former occasion recommended, and is still considered by the undersigned a measure very deserving of attention.

Considerable progress has been made in the interesting subjects of the survey of the coast, and the preparation of standard weights and measures for the several States, as well as for the United States. It will be fully explained in special communications.

Some further authority to sell or apportion the Spanish inscriptions, which belong to the claimants under the treaty of indemnity, is desirable, as the payments on them seem exposed to considerable delay. It is gratifying to be able to communicate the fact, that, under the French treaty, in addition to what has heretofore been paid to the claimants on the first four instalments, another sum for interest, amounting to one million and twenty-two thousand one hundred and eighty-five francs, has probably been paid, which will be apportioned among them as soon as it can be remitted to this country.

Several resolutions of one or the other House of Congress, calling on the Department for special information to be submitted at the present session, have received careful attention.

The most important of them are such as relate to a system of telegraphs—to the proper sites for more light-houses on a part of the Atlantic coast—the plans most suitable for several marine hospitals—the defaults unadjusted of all collecting and deposite agents since the foundation of the Government, and copies of the returns of specie and bank paper from the land offices and public depositories since the adoption of the Specie circular. These are all ready to be reported on at an early day.

This Department, by a resolution of the House of Representatives, has also, for some years, been engaged in procuring, through the Franklin Institute, a series of experiments to be made on the strength of the materials employed in steam-boilers, and the best methods of preventing explosions. Several able communications concerning these matters have been made by the Institute, and were heretofore submitted to Congress.

A final report on the whole subject has been completed since the last annual session, and a printed copy of it for each member will be laid before the House in a few days. An anxious hope is felt that the great care evinced by the Institute in an inquiry so momentous to the security of property and life, and guided by all the lights of science, will not have been so long devoted in vain, but will lead to useful legislation by the General Government, as well as the State Legislatures. The increased and increasing importance of the subject must be offered as an apology for the earnestness with which its early consideration is again pressed.

The disasters of the past year have been so frequent and appalling, that they seem to call with more urgency than usual for the passage of laws the most rigid, and, in some respects, penal. Their provisions might well be directed to ensure proper strength in the original materials for the boilers; to provide the best securities for the safe construction of both them and the vessels; and to exact, by exemplary punishments, vigilance and promptitude in the adoption of all approved safeguards against the calamities of explosions, conflagrations, and wrecks. When we advert to the extensive sea coast, the large lakes, and numerous rivers within our jurisdiction, which are covered with machinery propelled by a power so vast, either for good or evil, it must be obvious that the consideration and due disposal of these questions at an early day are important, not only to the preservation of much property, but to public tranquillity and the cause of humanity.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. C. JOHNSON submitted the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States communicate to this House the causes which have delayed the sailing of the South Sea Surveying and Exploring Expedition; and also to cause to be laid before Congress all the documents and correspondence within the control of the Navy Department, calculated to inform this House of the true causes of the delay.

Which, under the rule, lies over one day.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

The order offered by Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, on Monday, for the appointment of the standing committees of the House coming up—

Mr. EVERETT moved to postpone it till tomorrow, and gave, as a reason for the motion, his desire to have a more full House, many valuable members being at present absent, and his impression being that the absentees would be excluded from being placed on the committees.

Mr. WHITTLESEY wished the sense of the House taken on that point, and he propounded an inquiry to the Chair in relation to it.

The CHAIR believed that he had no power, under the rules and all former practice, to appoint any member to a committee who might be absent.

Mr. WHITTLESEY expressed a hope that the practice might be varied hereafter, so that the public time might not be wasted by so much delay at the commencement of every session.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the order till to-morrow was then agreed to, nem. dis.

MENDMENT OF RULES.

The House then took up the following, submitted by Mr. UNDERWOOD, on Monday last, as an additional rule of the House.

"It shall also be the duty of the Clerk to compile a separate journal of the yeas and nays in such manner as to exhibit the questions decided, and the vote of each member; and at the end of every session he shall cause to be printed as many copies thereof as will be sufficient to furnish one copy for every thousand free male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years in the United States, the number of such free males to be determined by the Clerk from the latest statistical information; and he shall distribute such copies among the Executives of the several States, in proportion to the relative number of such free males in each State."

After some remarks from Messrs. UNDERWOOD, HAYNES, CRAIG, and HAMER, it was laid on the table, on motion of the last gentleman.

FLORIDA WAR.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. UNDERWOOD, on Monday last, was then taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before Congress copies of all orders and instructions given to the commander in chief of the force in Florida, authorizing him to raise troops or to call into service any portion of the militia, or to accept the services of volunteers for the purpose of surpressing Indian hostilities, and that said Secretary report what measures, if any, have been adopted to enlist and procure the services of other Indian warriors to fight against the Seminoles, the number of Indians so enlisted or taken into service of the United States, the tribes to which they respectively belong, the length of time they have been engaged to serve, and the amount of pay promised them; and that the said Secretary also report the number of troops of all classes engaged and called into service for the purpose of prosecuting the war in Florida at the present time.

Mr. BRIGGS offered the following amendment; which Mr. UNDERWOOD accepted as a modification: "The amount of money expended, and the whole number of troops employed since the commencement of the war."

The resolution, so modified, was then agreed to, nem. dis.

WESTERN ARMORY.

Mr. CARTER asked leave to submit a resolution referring that portion of the President's message relating to the establishment of a Western Armory, to a select committee, and that said committee be instructed to report by bill or otherwise.

The CHAIR ruled it out of order, as the whole Message had already been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, wherein, when the House went into committee, the motion would be in order.

Mr. CARTER accordingly withdrew it.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,

The House adjourned.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting a transfer of appropriation that has been made in that Department, in pursuance of the power vested in the President, by the 1st section of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1809, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments.

M. VAN BUREN.

The Message having been read, was, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The resolution offered by Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, on Monday last, ordering the appointment of the standing committees of the House, was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. HAYNES moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up and referring the President's Message.

Mr. BELL inquired if it was not altogether unusual to do this before the committees had been announced? He should like first to see their complexion.

Mr. HAYNES explained his object to be to accelerate business.

Mr. BELL hoped it would not be pressed then.

Mr. HAYNES left the motion at the disposition of the House

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, inquired if there had ever been an instance of the House going into committee on the President's Message till after the appointment of the standing committees?

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested that the gentleman from Georgia have his resolution printed, as a notice of a motion to submit hereafter.

Mr. HAYNES assented, and made that motion, which was agreed to by the House.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. MAURY, was taken up and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House copies of such documents on file in his office as may have relation to the claims for compensation of the company or companies of volunteer mounted men, who, in conformity with the proclamation of the Governor of Tennessee, issued under the authority of a requisition from General Gaines, organized and equipped themselves for the Florida campaign, but who were not mustered into the service of the United States.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

The following resolution, also offered yesterday, by Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, was then taken up.

Resolved, That the President of the United States communicate to this House the causes which have delayed the sailing of the South Sea Surveying and Exploring Expedition; and also cause to be laid before Congress all the documents and correspondence within the control of the Navy Department, calculated to inform this House of the true causes of this delay.

Mr. J. modified his resolution by the following substitute, which was considered and agreed to by the House.

Resolved, That the President of the United States communicate to this House the causes which have delayed the outfit and preparation of the South Sea Surveying and Exploring Expedition, required by the act of Congress of May, 1836, making appropriation for the naval service. And also that the President cause to be furnished copies of all letters, documents and communications, which have passed between the Secretary of the Navy, the Commissioners of the Navy Board, the officers appointed to the chief command, and of all other officers or persons, relative to all matters connected with the preparation, outfit and sailing of the said expedition. And that the President also communicate to this House the causes which now delay the sailing of the expedition.

The House adjourned.

Messrs. ROBBINS, ALLEN, and WALL, were accordingly appointed.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition from sundry citizens of Illinois, praying right of pre-emption to the lands on which they reside, and relief from the encroachments of certain Polish exiles and their agents: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, soliciting that all executions ordered under the laws of the United States, be directed to take place in the prison yards, as required by the laws of Pennsylvania. Mr. McK. made some allusion to the collection of idle and dissolute persons, which the disgusting exhibition of public executions never failed to attract, and mantained that they were without that salutary effect upon the public morals which had been attributed to them, as might easily be shown from the excesses which had been committed at places of public execution in this country.

Mr. McK. moved the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a petition from Silas M. Stilwell, a citizen of New York, in relation to the abolishment of imprisonment for debt in the United States. Mr. T. said the petitioner in this case was a gentleman of standing, and had been for many years a member of the Legislature of that State; in fact, he believed, at the very time the odious system of imprisonment for debt had been abandoned. Notwithstanding this, the anomaly has existed of persons being imprisoned for debt under the laws of the United States, which laws infringed on the personal liberty of the citizens of New York, in violation of the express will of the State. The just and humane enactment of the Legislature had been rendered a mere nullity, because persons from other States had the privilege of bringing their suits in the United States courts; indeed, there had been instances of persons removing from the State of New York in order to acquire a residence in another State, for the very purpose of availing themselves of the United States courts. Mr. T. said what the petitioner desired, was an entire abolishment of the odious practice; but if so enlightened a body as Congress should not agree with his views, he (the petitioner) prayed that it would at least so far acquiesce, as to make the United States laws conform with the laws of those States wherein imprisonment for debt was abolished. This petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, it was

On motion of Mr. WALKER, two memorials from the Legislature of Mississippi, presented by him at the last session, were taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAVIS asked leave to introduce a bill authorizing the President of the United States to direct the public vessels to cruise on the coast during the winter season, for the purpose of relieving distressed seamen, &c. Mr. D. said he gave notice, he believed, at the close of the last session, that he would, at an early period of the present one, ask leave to introduce such a bill. As the present season was already so far advanced, an early action on the bill would be obvious to the minds of all those who looked to the great loss of property and sacrifice of human life, to which the Northern coast of this country was subject during the winter. Mr. D. explained that vessels from Europe, at this season of the year, had to encounter adverse winds, which not unfrequently detained them until they were short of provisions, which together with the extreme cold, so far impaired the physical energies of the crew, as to oftentimes lead to the loss of property, and the still more lamentable loss of human life. The object of the present bill, was to cause the public vessels to cruise on the coast, for the purpose of affording to the distressed mariner the relief he might need. Mr. D. felt that the bill would meet the hearty cooperation of the citizens of this country, as he knew it would of the gallant officers of our Navy, who were ready at all times to lead their aid in the relief of suffering humanity. Leave having been granted, this bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CRITTENDEN obtained leave to introduce a bill in relation to suppressing the Express Mail; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Also, a bill authorizing the issuing of patents for lands on Green Bay, Wisconsin Territory; twice read, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, the petition of Susan Johnston, and the heirs of John Johnston, praying Congress to confirm his claim, reported upon favorably by the board of land commissioners at Detroit, for two tracts of land at the Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. CRITTENDEN offered a resolution in relation to obtaining from the Postmaster General certain information of the cost of the Express Mail.

This resolution having been read—

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky thought it might improve the value of the information if the resolution was made to discriminate between the amount received from the Government, as he understood some considerable portion of the revenue arising from this mail was derived from that source.

Mr. GRUNDY said he believed there was a proposition to extend the Express Mail far beyond its present limits. If the object of the resolution was to inquire the whole cost, he thought the resolution should take a wider range. At present, the mail was carried only through the most populous parts of the country; and if the receipts and expenditures of that part alone were considered, we might be led into great error. All he wished was to act understandingly on the whole subject; and he thought if the resolution were made to embrace the probable cost of the proposed extension, and upon what routes the mail was now carried, the object would be effected.

These suggestions having been admitted, the resolution was adopted, and reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to the Senate the amount of postage which has accrued from the Express Mail since its first establishment under the act of 1836, discriminating between that portion of it paid by the Government, or any department or officer thereof, and that paid by private individuals; and to report also the total amount of cost or expense incurred by the Government in the establishment and maintenance of the said Express Mail from its origin; and also to report what will be the annual cost of said establishment as it now exists, and according to existing contracts and arrangements; and also what will be the probable cost of the proposed extension not yet contracted for, and upon what routes the said mail is now carried.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the heirs of Dr. Nathan Babbit, late of New Hampshire, deceased, the pay due to said deceased, for his services, as a Surgeon's mate, in the army of the Revolution, from the 7th day of July 1778, to the first day of December in said year.

Mr. HUBBARD also moved, that the papers relating to the petition of Nathaniel Gunnison, presented by him at the last session, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, that the papers relating to the petition of James Wheeler be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HUBBARD also submitted a resolution which was adopted, inquiring into the expediency of allowing G. Morse to surrender a certain land patent, and receive in lieu thereof a patent for a like quantity of land suitable for cultivation.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved that the petition of Samuel Miller, heretofore presented by him, praying a reward for the apprehension of a Cherokee Indian, guilty of murder, who had broken jail, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of Elizabeth Patrick, praying to be allowed certain back pay alleged to be due her husband, an officer in the late war.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a petition praying an alteration in the post route in Milford, which it was represented would materially shorten the distance: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAVIS moved that the petition of the Nantucket Steamboat company, for remuneration for carrying the mails from Wood's Hole to New Bedford, be taken from the files of the last session, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BENTON moved that the papers relating to the claim of Henry Morfit be removed from the files, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. ALLEN gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a joint resolution to so far amend the Constitution of the United States, as related to the election of President and Vice-President thereof.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported the following bills without amendments, which were severally ordered to a second reading:

Bill remitting the duties on certain goods destroyed by the late conflagration at New York.

Bill repealing the duties on foreign cordage and hemp.

Bill for the relief of Elisha Town.

Bill for the relief of Thadeus and Erastus Fairbanks.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the following resolution, submitted by him on Thursday last, was taken up and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a new land district in the State of Alabama, to embrace the territory ceded under the late treaty with the Cherokee Indians.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate went into Executive business; and, after a few moments, the doors wer re-opened.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. ADAMS presented several other petitions from Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, etc. on the same subject, and made the same motions of reference, which were severally laid on the table, on motion of Mr. WISE.

Mr. ADAMS then presented another of the same tenor.

Mr. LAWLER raised the preliminary question of reception, on which

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 144, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Aycrigg, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Yell—59.

So the petition was received.

When the name of Mr. RIVES was called, that gentleman rose in his place, and inquired of the Chair the effect of this motion prevailing.

The CHAIR replied that it left the petition still at the disposition of the House.

Mr. RIVES said then he should vote for the re-cention, in order to give this petition the same disposition as had been given to the others, viz: laying them on the table.

Mr. WISE explained, that the reason he had not originally raised the question moved by the gentleman from Alabama, was, that the question just decided had already been decided so often by the House, by Southern as well as by Northern members voting to receive abolition petitions. It was for that reason he had moved to lay the motion of reference on the table, for he was determined to meet the question at every step where it could be met. Mr. W. asked the gentleman from Massachusetts to include all his petitions in one motion.

Mr. ADAMS said he could not assent to it.

Mr. ADAMS then presented a petition for the abolition of slavery in the Teritories of the United States, and moved its reference to the Committee on the Territories; whereupon,

Mr. WISE moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and were—yeas 127, nays 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beirne, Bell Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, T. J. Carter, Wm. B. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, }
Dec. 12, 1837. }

GENTLEMEN: In the report of the proceedings of this House yesterday, as published in your paper of that date, on the resolution offered by myself for a further appropriation of land to Alabama, to continue the improvements at the Muscle and Colbert shoals, it is erroneously stated that I accepted the amendment offered by General CARTER of Tennessee.

I refused to accept the amendment alluded to, and stated my reasons fully to the House.

Your ob't servant,

R. CHAPMAN.

Messrs. BLAIR and RIVES.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, Dec. 13, 1837.

Messrs. BLACK and SOUTHARD appeared and took their seats.

The Hon. WILSON LUMPKIN, Senator elect from Georgia, and the Hon. A. H. SEVEIR, Senator elect from Arkansas, were duly qualified and took their seats.

Private petitions were presented by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, PRENTISS, WALL, KNIGHT, CLAYTON and others, and referred to the appropriate Committees.

Also, on motion, papers of a private character presented on last session were removed from the files and severally referred.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Mr. Perkins, a citizen of the United States, though for many years a resident of Great Britain, stating that he was the inventor of an improved mode of warming the public buildings, and praying that the officer charged with the issuing of patents, may be specially authorized to issue in his favor, though absent: referred to the Committee on Patents.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a pension agency at Montpelier, in the State of Vermont, for the payment of all pensioners of the United States resident in the counties of Washington, Orange, Caledonia, Orleans, Essex, and Lamoille, in said State.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all instructions to registers and receivers of the different land offices respecting pre-emption rights, and the other description of claims on the public lands, commonly called "floats," with copies of the opinions of the late or present Attorney General respecting these claims.

Also, on motion of Mr. TIPTON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the constructing a road in the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for the payment of the heirs and representatives of Lieutenant William Redmond, deceased, the commutation money promised the officers of the continental line who should continue in service to the end of the war of the Revolution, and that the said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Agreeably to notice given, Mr. KING introduced a bill for the encouragement of the employment of boys in the vessels of the United States: read twice and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUBBARD introduced a bill to authorize the payment of invalid pensioners in certain cases: read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. YOUNG introduced a bill for the relief of John Newton. Mr. Y. said he would take this occasion to mention that the case in question had before been presented, and had been favorably acted on, but had been lost in the other House for want of time: no doubt existed in his mind of the merits of the case. The bill having been reap twice, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. YOUNG also introduced a bill to authorize certain soldiers of the last war with Great Britain to surrender their bounty lands, and to select others: read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a bill for the relief of Jane Warner; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama gave notice that he would on to-morrow introduce a bill for the relief of William C. Easton.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced the receipt of sundry papers of claimants for their services, etc.; which were, on motion, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom had been referred the resolution inquiring into the condition of the currency of the District of Columbia, reported a bill in part. This bill having been read by its title—

Mr. CLAY said he hoped the bill would be read; that he liked to hear every thing in relation to the currency When the provisions of the bill having been read by the Secretary of the Senate—

Mr. CLAY remarked, that bill imposed very heavy pains and penalties, and wished to inquire why this devoted District was to be thus doomed. Before any thing was done with it, he would inquire of the chairman if the committee was full when he was instructed to report it, and whether the consent of all the members of the committee had given sanction to the report?

Mr. WRIGHT said he was happy to give the gentleman the information he desired, though he deemed it rather a strange proceeding at so early a stage as the second reading of the bill. He would state, for the gratification of the gentleman, that three of the members of the committee were present who had instructed him to report the bill; it was the same, verbatim et literatim, as that presented at the last session, which had been discussed at length in the Senate, and the yeas and nays taken thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, showing many interesting details in relation to the same: ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, five hundred additional copies were ordered for the use of the Land Office.

At the same the VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, showing an abstract of the expenditures for the year 1837; laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting certain information in accordance with a resolution of the Senate of the 12th October last, containing copies of correspondence in relation to the seizure and sequestration of the American ship Mary, by the Dutch Government, at the island of Curracoa in 1810.

Also, a message from the President, in obedience to a resolution of the 13th October, requesting information in relation to obtaining from the Mexican Government an acknowledgment of the claims of American citizens.

Mr. CLAY said he presumed these contained what had already been before the Senate; he thought it unnecessary to print them; but afterwards observed he was under a wrong impression, and moved for the printing, which was accordingly ordered.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Senate then took up the bill to authorize the public vessels to cruise on the coast during the winter season; which was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the bills to remit the duties on goods destroyed at the late fire in New York, and to allow a drawback on hemps and cordage, were taken up, and Messrs. WRIGHT and KNIGHT having given explanations in relation to the same: they were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then went into executive business, and after a few minutes, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, Dec. 13, 1837.

Mr. FLETCHER of Massachusetts asked permission of the Chair to make some statements in reference to a publication which had appeared in the Globe of that morning, signed by certain members of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The publication alluded to is as follows:

The undersigned have seen, with surprise, an attack made upon the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, by the Hon. Richard Fletcher, of Massachusetts, a member of that committee at the late extra session. In a speech purporting to have been delivered in Faneuil Hall, and published in the Atlas and other papers at Boston, the place of that member's residence, the following statement and charges are made, and have not, to their knowledge, been disavowed by him. He says that:

"During the session, the business projects upon which the House were called to act, came almost entirely from the Committee of Ways and Means. There are nine members of that committee, only two of whom are understood to be opposed to the general policy of the Administration. I suppose you would like to know the manner in which the business was arranged for the House. I will tell you the Ways—the Means you will all see in due time. You doubtless suppose that this Committee of Ways and Means has some duty to do; some ways to devise; some means to find out; some plans to originate and mature for the action of the House. The Committee, you imagine, look over the Message; see what is recommended to be done for the benefit of the country; consult together as to the best measures, and lay the result of their deliberations before the House. Is this your idea, Mr. President? Is this what you think, fellow-citizens? If it is, I am sorry to inform you, that you labor under a very great mistake. I once entertained the same ideas; but I soon found my error. No such thing, sir—no such thing. The chairman of the committee steps up to the White House, and there receives from the President or the Secretary of the Treasury such bills as they wish to have passed by the House. The chairman puts the bills into his pocket; takes them to the committee, without any examination; the majority of the committee approve them; the minority can do nothing; the bills are presented to the House, and received as the doings of the committee.

"I aver to you that every important bill passed by the House, came to the House, ready drawn, from the Executive. The Representatives are mere machines. Every measure is an Executive measure. I mean by the Executive, the President, and the heads of Departments; the cabinet. They originate every thing, put every thing into the precise shape they wish, word for word, letter for letter, comma for comma; and the Executive majority in the House pass each bill forthwith, without alteration—and so far as depends upon them, without debate—just as it comes from their masters at the white house."

The member from Massachusetts alleges that the chairman of the committee "steps up to the white house, and there receives from the President or the Secretary of the Treasury, such bills as they wish to have passed by the House. The chairman puts the bills into his pocket, takes them to the committee, without any examination the majority of the committee approve them."

The chairman of the committee states in reply, that he had no consultation whatever with the President concerning any one of the bills reported by the committee, nor did he receive either of the bills, or any part of either, from him. The usage from the commencement of the Government has been for the committee, through its chairman, to consult the head of the Department in regard to such measures as he may recommend for the consideration of Congress; for the Secretary to attend on, and confer with, the committee, if invited, and to furnish drafts of bills embracing his own propositions, when requested to do so. This is but an act of courtesy to the officer who recommends a measure connected with the business of his department, and whose duty it is, when the law is enacted, to construe and execute it.

The chairman of the committee did consult the Secretary of the Treasury about the bills referred to, and he did so with the knowledge and assent of the committee. At his request the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted to him drafts of most of the bills; but the undersigned declare it to be utterly untrue that any one of them was adopted by the committee. The measures recommended in the Treasury report were duly considered by the committee, but not one of the bills reported corresponded in form with any prepared by the Secretary, and most of them essentially differed in principle from the suggestions of that officer.

The member from Massachusetts not only alleges that the majority of the committee approved the bills "without any examination," but he "avers that every important bill passed by the House came to the House, ready drawn, from the Executive," and that "the Executive majority in the House passed each bill forthwith, without alteration—and, so far as depends upon them, without debate." The bills reported by both committees, differing as they do, and the proceedings of the two Houses upon them, prove these statements to be untrue. The two Houses had assembled at an extra session, and there was a general desire, without regard to party, to make it a short one. From its different organization, the Senate was enabled to appoint its committees on the 8th of September; those of the House were not announced till the 11th of that month. Before the Committee of Ways and Means met on the 12th, the Committee on Finance of the Senate had been for some days employed in preparing the bills; consequently, the former had no opportunity to act upon them until after they had been matured by the latter committee. Both Houses were anxious that all the bills should be reported without delay, and the Committee of Ways and Means were in session daily till the most important were submitted to the House. In examining these bills, it will be found that the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means not only differed with the Senate committee, but with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, both in principle and in detail.

The bill of the Senate authorized Treasury notes to be issued bearing interest; the bill reported to the House directed them to be issued without interest. The former proposed interest from the date, and for twelve months only, the latter provided, that if they were not redeemed at the expiration of that term, the interest should then commence. The details of the two bills were consequently essentially different. At the suggestion of a member of the committee, an additional penal section was introduced into the bill, with the concurrence of the member from Massachusetts. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, proposed an issue of Treasury notes of small denominations; the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means authorized none to be issued under one hundred dollars. The former recommended that they should be re-issued; the latter contained no such provision.

The next and the most important bill, commonly called the "divorce bill" was essentially amended. The bill reported to the Senate related wholly to the safe keeping of the public money, and contained no provision as to the medium in which it was to be collected. The Committee of Ways and Means added another section providing for this material point, and altered the title of the bill accordingly.

The bill further postponing the payment of merchants' bonds, as reported to the House, contained an additional section, giving a credit on the duties on merchandise remaining in the public stores upon which the duties were payable in cash: a provision not suggested in the Treasury Report, nor embraced in the Senate bill. The Committee on Ways and Means, subsequently, and unanimously, instructed its chairman to move to strike out the 2d section of the Senate bill, which proposed to make the additional credit upon bonds applicable to importations, for one year from and after the 1st October, and to insert the section referred to, extending the credit to three and six months on all merchandise which was then in the public warehouses, or might arrive before the 1st of November. Amendments were also made to other bills, but those mentioned were the most material.

The member from Massachusetts is still more particular in his statements about the origin and history of these bills. He says that the President and the Heads of Departments "originate every thing, put every thing in the precise shape they wish, word for word, letter for letter, comma for comma, and the Executive majority in the House pass each bill forthwith, without alteration—and so far as depends upon them without debate—just as it comes from their masters in the White House!"

The undersigned, to ascertain whether these grave and extraordinary charges were founded in truth, have compared the drafts of the bills furnished to the chairman by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. No drafts were received of the bills relating to the fourth instalment under the deposite act, the banks in this District, or the warehousing of merchandise. It is proper here to state, that a warehousing bill was reported at a former session by the present chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and prior to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. The bills received from the Secretary were those for adjusting claims on the deposite banks; extending the merchants' bonds; making public officers the keepers of the public money, and authorizing Treasury notes to be issued. The bills relating to the merchants' bonds, and the claims upon the banks reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, differ both in language and principle from those prepared by the Secretary. Of the ten sections of the bill providing for the safe-keeping of the public money, but three correspond with those framed by that officer. Some of the provisions in the Treasury note bills correspond; they are, however, generally such as are transcribed from the Treasury note act of 1815. But to prove how utterly unfounded are the statements of the member from Massachusetts, that the Secretary's drafts were adopted by the Committee of Ways and Means "word for word, letter for letter, comma for comma," and as a specimen of the general resemblance of these bills, the undersigned present the three first sections of the Secretary's draft, and of the bill reported by the Committee relating to Treasury notes:

Draft of the Secretary of the Treasury.	As reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.
Be it enacted, &c. That whenever the available money in the Treasury applicable to public purposes, and not on deposit with the States, shall be at any time hereafter less than five millions of dollars, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to direct the issue of acknowledgments of indebtedness, in the form of Treasury notes, whenever the public officers and creditors are willing to receive the same at par in payment of their claims, or others are willing to advance money on them at par, to aid in accomplishing the same payment.	Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause Treasury notes, not bearing interest, for such sum or sums as he may think expedient, but not exceeding, in the whole amount of notes issued, the sum of twelve millions of dollars, and of denominations not less than one hundred dollars for any one note, to be prepared, signed, and issued in the manner hereinafter provided.
2. That the amount of said notes which may from time to time be issued shall not exceed the sum necessary to defray the estimated current demands on the Treasury during the current year beyond the amount of the current receipts and the five millions aforesaid, to be kept in the Treasury to meet sudden contingencies, and re-	SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Treasury notes, authorized to be issued by the first section of this act, shall be reimbursed and redeemed by the United States, at the Treasury thereof, after the expiration of one year from the dates of the said notes respectively. The reimbursement herein provided for shall der its operations prompt, easy, and useful.

3. That said notes may be in their denominations not less than twenty dollars, and in form running to the creditor, public officer, or purchaser, and order or to bearer, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, and transferrable by delivery and endorsement of the original payee thereon when to order. They shall, as checks on each other, and for public safety, be signed by the Treasurer and Register of the Treasury, and an accurate account be kept by each of them of the amount issued and redeemed, the Treasurer being charged and required to account quarterly for all delivered to him by the Register for signature. They shall in all cases be receivable for dues of all kinds to the United States, and bear no interest, unless it be found, on trial, that a sufficiency of them to meet the public engagements will not be voluntarily received by the public creditors and officers in payment, or by others (or specie, without interest; in which case interest may be stipulated to be paid on the face of them not to exceed six per cent. per annum, the rate to be fixed by the President; and money may be raised thereon by sale or delivery at not less than par, sufficient to meet the current expenses as aforesaid. If any of said notes on interest be issued, they shall not be receivable for public dues of any kind, unless otherwise directed by the President, until the Department is ready to redeem them, and may then adopt that mode, or any other, for such purpose, under such regulations as to their redemption, return, and cancelling, as may be deemed most safe and convenient.

be made at the Treasury of the United States to the holders of the said notes respectively, upon presentment; and in case of presentment and non-payment of said note or notes after they become due, the holder or holders shall be entitled to receive interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum from the date of demand of payment. And for this reimbursement, according to the provisions of this act, the faith of the United States is hereby solemnly pledged.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said Treasury notes shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be respectively signed, on behalf of the United States, by the Treasurer thereof, and countersigned by the Register of the Treasury; and that those officers respectively shall, as checks upon each other, and to secure the public safety, keep separate, full, and accurate accounts of the number, date, denomination, and amount of all the notes signed and countersigned by them respectively; which said accounts shall be carefully preserved and placed on file in the Treasury Department; and, also, similar accounts, kept and preserved in the same manner, of all the said notes redeemed, as the same shall be returned and cancelled; and the Treasurer shall further account quarterly for all such notes delivered to him for signature or issue by the Register. The Treasurer and Register of the Treasury are hereby authorized, by and with the consent and approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, to employ such additional temporary clerks, as the duties enjoined upon them by this section may render necessary: the compensation of each clerk so employed to be fixed by the Secretary.

In the same speech the member from Massachusetts says:

"A resolution was introduced into the House from the Committee of Ways and Means, declaring that it is inexpedient to charter a national bank. You may feel some interest to know how that resolution was got up. I will tell you. You will recollect that there were only two Opposition members on the committee. The majority would do nothing for the people, and the minority could do nothing, except to report the doings of their masters in the committee and the House to their masters, the people; and this at least I, for one, am resolved to do. Very many petitions, from almost all the States, were sent into Congress for the establishment of a national bank. These petitions, as they were presented, by a mutual understanding, were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and suffered to lie on the table till the whole should come in, when, as was supposed, they were to be taken up and considered. So the matter stood; when, on the last day but one on which that committee sat, the chairman, without preface or explanation, introduced the above resolution. It was opposed by one Opposition member, the other being absent; and the chairman was asked what had become of the petitions? They yet lay on the table; but the majority passed the resolution, without opening or reading one of them. The resolution was sent in, and by the help of the previous question, was forced through the House. No doubt can be entertained that this resolution came down from the Executive in the precise form in which it passed. Here was a great and most manifest outrage on the liberties of the citizens. At least they have the right to petition, if they have no other; and yet, in a time of the greatest anxiety, when it was of the most vital importance that the views of the people should be communicated to their representatives, here was a successful attempt on the part of the Executive to cut off this intercourse; to prevent the voice of the people from being heard; to erect a barrier between the people and their constituents."

The member from Massachusetts states that "on the last day but one on which that committee sat, the chairman, without preface or explanation, introduced the above resolution." The question was three times before the committee, and twice postponed at the request of the minority—once at the suggestion of the member from Massachusetts himself; and was ultimately postponed to a particular day, with a distinct understanding by every member that the question was then to be finally disposed of in the committee. He further says that the chairman was asked "what had become of the petitions?" The memorials, petitioning for the incorporation of a national bank, were generally printed copies of a memorial which had been some months previous prepared by the Board of Trade of New York, and circulated and published throughout the Union. Numerous copies of the same memorial had been printed by order of the House, laid upon the tables of the members, were in the possession of the members of the committee, and many copies of the same were on the table of the committee, in view of the member from Massachusetts, at the time he says the inquiry was made, "what had become of the petitions?" The contents of the memorials being familiar to all, the reading was not asked for by any member of the committee, and was not required even by the member himself, who subsequently appears as the advocate of the petitioners. The member from Massachusetts adds, "no doubt can be entertained that this resolution came down from the Executive in the precise form in which it passed." The resolution was drawn by the chairman of the committee after a discussion as to its form, and in the presence of the committee, and of the member himself.

The undersigned regret that the absence of Mr. Owens of Georgia, prevents him from uniting with them in repelling the unwarrantable and unfounded charges of the member from Massachusetts.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11, 1837.

The question having been put, and the leave accorded,

Mr. FLETCHER observed that the article in relation to which he wished to make an explanatory statement, referred to a publication which had appeared in some of the papers of Boston, and purporting to be a speech delivered by him on a late occasion in that city. In reference to that publication, he had to say that it had not been made by him, or revised by him; nor had he seen it until it appeared in the public prints. The publication was in no sense his; nor was he in any sense responsible for it; nor had his attention been called to it until the article in the Globe of this morning had been shown to him. One member of the Committee of Ways and Means resided in New Hampshire, (Mr. Atherton,) near him; the chairman of the committee (Mr. Cambreleng) had his house in the city of New York, within twenty-four hours' communication of him at any time; yet he had never heard from any one of the members of the committee any thing on the subject of the publication in question. He had received no communication from any member of the committee until he had seen that which was contained in the Globe of this morning. The remarks alluded to had been published by the Boston papers early in November, some weeks before the present meeting of Congress; it was now the second week of the session, and he now, for the first time, heard anything from any of the gentlemen of the committee touching that publication.

He saw in the statement in the Globe that the gentlemen who had affixed their signatures to the article expressed regret at the absence of Mr. Owens, another member of the committee, and who, as they said, would concur with them in all they had stated. They said nothing, however, of another member of that committee, Mr. Sergeant of Philadelphia, now absent, but who had been in this city since the commencement of the present session. Had Mr. F. received any intimation of an intention to submit such a statement to the public, he should have deemed the presence of that gentleman desirable. Mr. F. might then have had an opportunity of applying to him in relation to this matter, and the other members of the committee might have obtained his statement of the facts. Those facts Mr. F. now wished distinctly to state.

At the late session of Congress he had been put, a stranger, and an inexperienced member of the House, on the Committee of Ways and Means. At an early meeting of the committee, he could not say whether at the first meeting, though he thought it was, certain bills were submitted to the committee by its chairman, which, as he understood, had been drawn up by the Secretary of the Treasury. In fact, the statement of these gentlemen itself admitted that most, at least, of those bills had been drawn by that officer. The statement said that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had consulted with the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to those bills, and that this had been done with the knowledge and consent of the committee.

Mr. F. could speak only for himself; he at least had had no knowledge of such consultation until the bills had been introduced into the committee, nor did the statement assert that such consultation with the Secretary was known to the committee before the bills in question were laid before it. Mr. F. did understand, distinctly, that the bills originated with the Secretary; had received their form from him; and in that form had been submitted to the committee by its chairman. Now, whether ignorantly or otherwise, Mr. F. had supposed that such a course of things was improper; that it was a wide and dangerous departure from the theory and principles of our Government, which required that the Legislative and Executive departments should be kept entirely distinct from each other. This was not, and could not be, any matter of secresy; and he had considered it no violation of courtesy to speak of it; he accordingly had stated the case to several gentlemen of the House during the late session, and asked their opinion in regard to it; he found but one opinion on the subject—that the course was very improper. In the debate which took place in the House on these bills, it had been distinctly averred by one of the speakers that those bills did not originate with the committee, and this assertion had not been, at that time, denied or answered by any one. When he went home, he went under the impression that there was an improper interference of the Executive with the Legislative department of the Government.

He had afterwards been called on by his constituents, at a meeting held in Boston, to express his views in relation to our national affairs. That meeting, however, was not, as described in the Globe, a meeting called for the celebration of victories. It was the regular, customary meeting annually held previous to the annual election in Massachusetts. He had been, as he had said, called upon by his constituents to speak to them on our national affairs; and, in so doing, he had stated, in reference to the manner of conducting the business of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the bills reported from that committee originated with the Executive—came to the committee from the Executive drawn up in form, and were Executive measures. He had stated, in terms, however, that, in calling them Executive measures, he had not reference to the President simply, but also to the heads of departments. This had been his statement, and his comments upon the facts had been that this was, in his view, an improper and dangerous interference by the Executive with the legislative action of this Government. The subject of his remarks had been simply the danger of such an interference. The gentlemen, in their article, spoke of an attack on the majority of the committee. He had not so understood himself; his comment related to the impropriety of Executive interference.

Now, as to the details contained in the publication of the Globe, he only had to say that they were almost all founded on particular expressions contained in the report of the Boston papers of Mr. F's speech—expressions which were not his, and for which he was not responsible. The gentlemen who prepared that article must surely have made an exceedingly low estimate of his understanding if they supposed he could have said such things as had been there imputed to him. The article attributed to him the assertion that the Executive majority of the House passed each bill forthwith, without alteration; and this, when all the journals of the country contained the debates of the House on these very bills, and when the alterations which they had undergone in the House were so notorious that none could remain ignorant of them. To suppose that he should have had the folly to make such a statement at a public meeting, was, as he had said, putting rather a lower estimate upon his common sense than he had supposed some of those gentlemen would have done. Yet, a large portion of the details of the article in the Globe were founded on that supposed statement, and another equally unfounded as attributed to him. It was said that this course on the part of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was the usual, the customary course of business. As to that he had said nothing, and had nothing to say: he had only stated what he believed to be the fact in the matter, and which was substantially admitted by the gentlemen themselves. If that was, indeed, the usual course of business in that committee, then the remarks of Mr. F. on that subject might have no validity. As to that point he said nothing.

As to the resolution on the subject of a national bank, what occurred had been simply this. At an early stage of the meetings of the committee mention had been made of the petitions in relation to a bank, and Mr. F. had suggested whether it would not be better to refrain from considering that question until all the petitions should be before the committee. It was said in the article of the Globe that the subject had been up in the committee three different times. Mr. F. could not deny this, but he did not so recollect; he had no recollection of any thing being said about it until at the last meeting. It was said that the resolution finally reported in reference to a bank had been drawn up in his presence. He had come to the committee-room on that morning late, and his first recollection of the resolution was its being read by the chairman, and the question being put whether it should be reported to the House. Mr. F. never had stated what was the origin of that resolution; what he had said was a mere suggestion as to its origin; no fact had been stated by him; and he had, and claimed to have, no knowledge of its origin. What he did say at the meeting had been that the petitions on the subject of a bank had not been read in the committee, and he made a suggestion as to the origin of the resolution reported. This was all he had said or done in relation to that matter. He had said nothing upon any of these subjects which was not true, and which, as appeared to him, had not been substantially admitted to be true in the article in the Globe. He had done nothing which he had not deemed it his duty to do. Whether he was to be sustained in the discharge of duty was a question to be submitted to the justice of that House. If he might not rightly say all he had said, then had we no rights left which were worth possessing; and it was well that we should know, and the people should know, the ground on which we stand. He had, he repeated, endeavored to discharge his duty at all times decorously toward the House and every member of it. But, from the course which gentlemen had deemed it proper to take toward him personally, he judged it suitable that he should be discharged from remaining longer a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and he now made that request.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had a very brief reply to make, for he could not, after what had been passing for the last four weeks; after all the denunciations which had been heaped upon himself in all the Opposition prints; after the manner in which the member's speech had been printed and circulated; he could not, now or hereafter, make an issue with the gentleman—with the member from Massachusetts. He could appeal to his colleagues to disprove the truth of what the member had now said. Whether he had seen the speech published in his name, he did not know; this he knew, that the speech had been printed in extra quantity, and circulated in New Hampshire. He would leave it to the gentleman's—to the member's own notions of what was right, whether he should let a publication be circulated through his own State, and through the nation, for four weeks, and then come here and tell this House that he had never seen it, till he had seen it this morning in the Globe. Mr. C. should leave the member's speech in explanation, and the article in the Globe, to go together before the world.

Mr. FLETCHER rose to explain. He had not said that he had not seen the published report of his speech till he had seen it referred to and quoted in the Globe. What he had said was, that he had not seen it prior to its publication in the Boston papers, and that no particular attention to it had been given by him.

Mr. ATHERTON of New Hampshire (a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, who did not come into the House until Mr. FLETCHER had nearly concluded his remarks) observed that the member from Massachusetts had said that he had endeavored to discharge his duty as a member of the House and as a member of the committee with all due fidelity. Mr. A. claimed to have discharged his own with equal fidelity. The member from Boston had made no complaint to the committee as to the manner of conducting the business which came before it. He had always been treated by its members with the most perfect courtesy and kindness. What, then, was his surprise on seeing the report of a speech delivered by him, and with which Mr. A. understood him to acknowledge himself satisfied, denouncing the members of the committee in the severest manner! The speech had not been confined to the newspapers, but had been benevolently circulated by him, or his constituents, among the people in Mr. A's State. It was a speech in which there was more misrepresentation than he believed had ever been conveyed in so many words before; and it had been industriously circulated with a view to affect Mr. A's character, and also the ensuing election in New Hampshire. He would ask whether it had not been incumbent upon the member from Boston to suggest any fault he had to find with the proceedings of the Committee of Ways and Means at the time the impropriety occurred? and not sit silent and see the wrongs proceed, and make no complaint, and afterwards attack the character of the members of the committee in an abusive public speech, and by a tissue of the grossest misrepresentations? The member has intimated that he said in that speech nothing but what was true. Had he not said that the bills reported by the committee were reported word for word, letter for letter, comma for comma, just as they came from the Secretary of the Treasury?

[Mr. FLETCHER. I never said so.]

He intimated as much. For he says that all the important bills of the last session were reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and passed by the House, word for word and letter for letter, as they came down from the Executive. Is it true, that these bills were passed by the House, word for word and letter for letter, as they were reported by the committee or came from the Executive? It is enough to refer to the form of the bills as they were laid before the committee, and then as they were afterwards reported to the House. His statements are proved to be not correct, not only by the testimony of the gentlemen associated with him, but by written records on the files of the House, and in the hands of the chairman. The gentleman—the member from Boston, says that he made no assertion that the resolution on the subject of a national bank came from the Executive. What did he say? There could be no doubt that it came from the Executive in the very form in which it was reported by the committee. Now the truth is, that the first time the subject came up in committee, there was a discussion as to the form in which the resolution should be expressed; the member KNEW this, for he was himself present, and all the gentlemen of the committee knew it.

He says it was introduced without preface by the chairman of the committee. It was not introduced by the chairman at all, until he had been directed by the committee to draw it up. Surprising, indeed, that the member should make such an assertion, when the consideration of the subject was postponed once, if not twice, I am certain it was once, at his own request; and the last postponement was for a number of days, almost, if not quite, a week, with the understanding that the next time it was brought up, the committee would take some definite action in regard to it. I think the member's explanation only places him in a worse situation than before. I can only say that, until he disavows every word and every letter of the charges published as his, I can receive no explanation from him; and I here say that I shall take an opportunity of replying before my constituents in such a manner as I think his speech deserves.

Mr. JONES of Virginia, (another member of the Committee of Ways and Means,) said he did not know that he yet correctly understood the gentleman from Massachusetts. He rose to ascertain whether he did or not; for on that would greatly depend what he had to say to the House. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts disavow the extracts from his speech, contained in the article in the Globe of this morning?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes: the report of my speech was made without authority from me.

Mr. JONES resumed. These extracts being now disavowed by the gentleman, I shall trouble the House with but few remarks. I was, at the last session, without any solicitation on my part, as you, Mr. Speaker, can testify, honored with a seat upon the Committee of Ways and Means. Seeking no place, but resolved to decline no duty which might properly be assigned to me, as one of the representatives of the people, I proceeded to the discharge of the duties which devolved upon me, honestly and conscientiously; and now, when I look back upon my acts as a member of that committee, I am not conscious of having done any thing which my own conscience does not approve. In the discharge of our duties, it was our practice to bestow upon the very important subjects which came before us our best consideration. When the bills were taken up in committee, they were carefully read over, section by section, and adopted, rejected, or amended, as seemed to the committee best calculated to promote the interest of our common country. The conduct and deportment of the members toward each other was such as I had supposed calculated to secure to each, and, to every one, the respect and esteem of the others. No time for reflection or investigation was ever asked by the member from Massachusetts, which was not unhesitatingly, and, I believe, unanimously, accorded to him. No objection was at any time made by him, to the course of proceeding, or to the manner in which the business was transacted; and I was not aware that so much as even an unkind feeling was harbored by any member of the committee toward the gentlemen associated with him, until I reached this city, when, for the first time, I saw the speech attributed to the gentleman from Massachusetts. You, sir, can well imagine what was my astonishment, when I learnt that the slanders contained in that speech had, through the medium of the public press, been heralded to the world, under the sanction of his name.

To-day, for the first time, (so far as I am informed,) they have been disavowed by him. If in that disavowal, it had appeared that the charges had been published and circulated without his agency, and without his knowledge, whatever might have been the consequences to myself, in the charity of my heart I could have forgiven all, and been saved the necessity of this public notice of the act; but how stands the fact? That gentleman, in his explanation just made to the House, has informed us that he was not ignorant of their publication in the newspapers of the day; that he had seen them. Sir, they were published in the newspapers of the city of Boston, the place of his residence; read, doubtless, by his friends, and in the whole circle of his acquaintance; sent forth to the world under the sanction of his name, and never, (so far as I am informed) until this day, has he raised either his voice, or his pen, to contradict them. I could not doubt but that the publication was authorized by himself. If not, was it not due to those who were thus grossly and publicly slandered and traduced—was it not due to himself, as a man of honor, to correct so unfounded a calumny on the reputation of those with whom he had acted? Upon this subject there can be but one opinion.

I, sir, know no difference between the act of a man, done by his own volition, where he himself gives currency to a false charge, and the act of the same man, who permits to go, uncontradicted, a calumny calculated to affect so seriously the reputation of others.

I have taken occasion to state, that the course of conduct pursued by the members of the committee was such as appeared to me calculated to insure the respect and esteem of each other; but it now plainly appears, from the gentleman's own showing, that at the very time he was holding out to his colleagues the appearance of those feelings which gentlemen should cherish towards their companions on a committee, he was hunting up materials for striking a deadly blow at their reputation; for he has just stated, that he inquired of several gentlemen at the time whether the course which he represented the committee to have pursued was not unprecedented; and that he received for answer, that it was without a parallel. Thus it appears, that, while he made no disclosure of unkind feelings indulged in by himself, while he made no effort to correct the error of which he complained to others; he was laying up materials in preparation for a deadly blow. Sir, I envy not the feelings of that man who, while his lips speak the language of friendship, meditates in his heart how he may inflict the most deadly stab.

It is my duty to repel the charges which have been made; it is an unpleasant duty, but one rendered necessary by the circumstances of the case; and when I have to choose between inclination and duty, I trust I shall never hesitate.

I am well aware that the charges contained in the speech attributed to the gentleman from Massachusetts, have already received a circulation which puts it out of the power of those intended to be affected by them, entirely to counteract their influence. The poison has been infused into many a bosom, where the antidote can never reach it. Calumny flies on the wings of the wind, while truth follows but slowly in its path. As in all such cases, many, very many, will hear the charges, who will never hear the contradiction: the slander will reach many, who will never see the refutation.

I deem it proper to say, that, while respect for this House will restrain me from the use of terms with which the act deserves to be characterized, as these charges have been circulated in all directions, it is a duty I owe myself to say that they are without foundation in truth, and basely false.

Mr. FLETCHER was then discharged by the House, at his request, from any further duty as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means.

TEXAS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the motion made by Mr. ADAMS yesterday, to refer certain memorials presented at the present at the present and late special session of Congress by himself and colleagues, against the annexation of Texas, to a select committee.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HOWARD to refer them to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ADAMS addressed the House at length in support of his motion, and against the reference proposed by Mr. HOWARD, because the subject did not belong to that committee, and for the further reason that they were already committed against the prayer of the petitioners, two-thirds of them, six out of the nine, being slave-holders. Mr. A. addressed the House at length on the subject generally, being several times called to order by the Chair, and Messrs. LEGAR PETRIKEN, SNYDER, and RHETT, when, having taken his seat, he moved for leave to proceed, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The objections were then withdrawn, and Mr. A. concluded his remarks.

[The grounds upon which Mr. SNYDER called the gentleman from Massachusetts to order, were for referring to the death of Lovejoy, and accusing the people of Alton as guilty of murder and arson.

Mr. SNYDER demanded of the Speaker, whether he would be permitted to answer the remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, arraigning the conduct of the people of Alton, charging them with murder and arson. If he (Mr. S.) was permitted to answer them, he would give his consent for the gentleman to proceed, but if not, he was, in justice to his constituents, bound to call him to order.

The CHAIR remarked, that any reply to remarks made out of order would, of itself, be out of order.

Mr. ADAMS, at this stage, asked leave of the House to proceed, stating that he would not again refer to Lovejoy, and demanded the yeas and nays, which having been ordered—

Mr. SNYDER withdrew his objection, after th avowal of the gentleman from Massachusetts tha: he would not again advert to the subject.]

Mr. WISE then moved to lay the motion of reference and the petitions themselves on the table.

Mr. RHETT and Mr. DAWSON severally appealed to Mr. WISE to withdraw the motion, but he declined.

Mr. GRENNELL then asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were: yeas 127, nays 68, as follows:

So the whole subject was laid on the table.

COAST SERVICE.

Mr. SMITH moved that the House take up the bill from the Senate to authorize the President of the United States to cause public vessels to cruise upon the coast in the winter season, to relieve distressed navigators.

Mr. EWING of Indiana rose and objected.

Mr. SMITH moved a suspension of the rules; which prevailed.

The bill was then taken up, and having been twice read,

Mr. SMITH moved its engrossment.

Mr. WISE said he wished to make this bill much more liberal and extensive in its provisions, and he therefore moved its postponement till tomorrow; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON, on leave, from the Committee on Mileage, reported a resolution instructing that Committee to report a bill to make more uniform the pay allowed to members for mileage; which was agreed to.

Messrs. PATTON, MERCER, HUNTER, CRAIG, MORGAN, WISE, JONES, ROBERTSON, TALIAFERRO, BOULDIN, DROMGOOLE, JOHNSON, BEIRNE, MASON, and GARLAND of Virginia.

[Mr. BOULDIN presented the petition and papers of General Walter Jones, in relation to his claims against the United States.

Mr. BOULDIN said that he would briefly state the contents of this petition. This was common, and according to the rule; but in this case it seemed to him to be strikingly necessary. No doubt he said, there were those who knew the fact, that General Jones stood indebted to the United States, by judgment confessed, for a large sum of money, which judgment stood still not discharged. To such it would naturally be a surprise to be informed that he claimed to be a creditor, and not a debtor on a settlement.

Mr. BOULDIN said it was easily and naturally explained. The judgement was confessed for $10,000 to be discharged by payment of $4,622 13¾, with interest and costs, subject to a credit of all and any sums that General Jones could make appear to be due him from the United States, on account before the proper accounting officers of the Government, be within the term of six months. This he failed to do in proper form, in proper time, and so has received neither a credit on the judgment nor payment of the account, and has failed until now to state his accounts with such particularity, that they could be audited. The accounting officers having neglected his accounts long since, not for this want of justice, but for their want of form, and want of legal proof produced, although that proof was then, and is still matter of record entirely, appearing by the report of the Auditor, now presented. Thus has it happened, as it does but too often happen, that through negligence of pecuniary interest, genius pays a tax for its high distinctions, and conscious rectitude, disregarding form, finds itself somewhat embarrassed in appearance, for the want of those barriers, which greater circumspection, growing out of conscious weakness upon that point, might have so easily thrown around it.

There are few, however, if any, whose genius can better bear the tax, nor are there any whose character for honor and honesty will more easily and certainly relieve them from the embarrassment of thus being for a long time the apparent debtor of the Government, all the while being in fact the creditor.

This may appear strange to those not acquainted with General Jones, but to those acquainted with him there is nothing remarkable in it at all.

On motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 14, 1837.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, in relation to the expenses of light-houses and light-boats for the year 1837; which, on motion, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Department of State, showing the number of American seamen registered in the different ports: laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Petitions of a private nature were presented by Messrs. SOUTHARD, NILES, TALLMADGE, PRENTISS, RIVES, WRIGHT, TIPTON, and others; which were severally referred to their appropriate committees.

Also, a variety of papers presented at the last session were, on motion, removed from the files and sent to the proper committees.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of the Board of Public Works of the State of Illinois, praying for a grant of public lands.

Mr. FULTON presented a resolution from the Legislature of Arkansas, asking appropriations for a line of fortifications to be established on the western frontier of that State.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of A. P. Quimby, claiming the invention of a certain test to ascertain the quantity of water in steam boilers.

Mr. D. said this petition had been presented at the last session, and was referred to the Committee on Commerce. As the matters connected with this petition were not generally understood, he would move that it be printed, with the accompanying papers, among which were letters from scientific and professional gentlemen of distinction, among whom were some distinguished chemists. The object of the petitioner was to ask that an experiment may be directed by the Government to test the validity of his invention, which the petitioner was unable to do.

Mr. KING thought it would be better to refer this subject to a select committee, in order that its merits should be specifically inquired into.

Mr. DAVIS thought it might be more appropriately referred to the select committee of which Mr. GRUNDY was chairman, and which already had that subject before them.

Mr. GRUNDY was not willing that it should be so referred. It was not the province of that committee to interfere with the improvements of machinists or artists; it had already plenty on its hands, without adding tests of steam boilers to its other duties. This was an invention of a novel character, and might be a great improvement for all he knew, but the proper place for reference was the Committee on Patents, composed of scientific gentlemen, who were presumed to be acquainted with such things.

Mr. DAVIS still contended that the proper committee was the one on the preservation of human life, (he believed that was the title of the gentleman's bill.) This was not a question of patents, but preservation of human life, and certainly was cousin germain to the matter which the gentleman had under his investigation.

Mr. GRUNDY not assenting, after some further facetious remarks, the petitions was referred to the Committee on Patents.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate copies of the surveys, estimates and maps which have heretofore been directed by the Senate to be made at the harbor of Owlshead, and of Cobscook Bay, in Maine.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a separate office of Surveyor General for the State of Illinois; also, for establishing a new land office at Peoria in the same State.

Mr. ALLEN, agreeable to notice given, introduced the following joint resolution, which was read and referred to a select committee of nine, and ordered to be printed:

A JOINT RESOLUTION proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States; and which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intends and purposes as part of the Constitution:

That, hereafter, the President and Vice President of the United States shall be elected in the manner following: Each State shall be divided by the Legislature thereof into districts equal in number to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may then be entitled in the Congress of the United States; the said districts to be composed of contiguous territory, and to contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled to be represented under the Constitution, and to be laid off, for the first time, immediately after the ratification of these amendments; and afterwards, immediately after each successive apportionment of representatives shall have been made by the Congress of the United States. That, on the first Thursday, and succeeding Friday, in the month of August, of the year one thousand eight hundred and forty, and on the same days in every fourth year thereafter, the citizens of each State, who possesses the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, shall meet within their respective districts, and there vote for a President and Vice President of the United States; one of whom shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for President, and the one receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice President, in any district, shall be holden to have received the electoral vote of that district; which fact shall be immediately certified to the Governor of the State, to each of the Senators in Congress from such State, and to the President of the Senate. The right of fixing the places in the districts, at which the elections shall be held, the manner of holding them, of canvassing the votes, of deciding in case of equality of votes in the district, or of a contest of the electoral vote of the district, and of certifying the returns, is reserved exclusively to the Legislatures of the States. The Congress of the United States shall be in session on the second Monday in October, of the year one thousand eight hundred and forty, and on the same day in every fourth year thereafter; and the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, shall, as soon as convenient and practicable, proceed to open all the certificates and returns, and the electoral votes of the district shall be thereupon counted. The person having the votes of the greatest number of the electoral districts, for President, shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of districts; but if no person have such majority, then a second election shall be held on the first Thursday and succeeding Friday in December the next ensuing, which second election shall be confined to the two persons having received the two highest numbers of electoral votes for President at the preceding trial; but in case two or more persons shall have received the votes of an equal number of the electoral districts, and such number be less than, but next to, the number received by the person having the highest number, but less than a majority of the whole, at the preceding trial, then such second election shall be confined to the person having received the highest number, and to the elder or eldest of the two or more persons having received the next highest, and an equal number, at the preceding trial: which second election shall be conducted, the result certified, and the votes counted, in the same manner, in all respects, as in the first; and the person having the votes of the greater number of the electoral districts for President, at such election, shall be President. But if the two persons voted for, at the second election, shall have received the votes of an equal number of districts for President, then the House of Representatives shall proceed to elect between, and one of them for President; and, in such election by the House, each State shall have a number of votes equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may then be entitled in Congress, and a majority of the aggregate number of the votes of all the States shall be necessary to an election. The person having the votes of the greatest number of districts for Vice President at the first election shall be Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of votes given; and if no person have such majority, and if a President shall not have been elected at the first trial, then a second election shall, on the same days that an election is held for President, take place between, and to be confined to, the persons having the two highest numbers for Vice President, at the first trial; but in case two or more persons shall have received the votes of an equal number of the electoral districts for Vice President, and such number be less than, but next to, the number received by the person having the highest number, but less than a majority of the whole, at the preceding trial, then such second election shall be confined to the person having received the highest number, and to the elder or eldest of the two or more persons having received the next highest and an equal number at the preceding trial; and the person having received the votes of the greatest number of electoral districts for Vice President, at such second election, shall be the Vice President; and such second election shall be conducted, and the result certified, in all respects, in the same manner as the first; but if the two persons voted for as Vice President shall have received an equal number of votes in the second election, then the Senate shall elect one of them for Vice President, as is now provided in the Constitution. But when a second election by the people shall not be necessary for the office of President, and a Vice President shall not have been elected by a majority of the districts at the first trial, then the Senate shall elect a Vice President from the persons having the two highest numbers in the first election; but in case two or more persons shall have received the votes of an equal number of the electoral districts for Vice President, and such number less than, but next to, the number received by the person having the highest number, but less than a majority of the whole, at the preceding trial, and no second election for President shall be necessary, then the Senate shall, in electing a Vice President, choose between the person having received the votes of the greatest number of districts for Vice President at the first trial, and the elder or eldest of the two or more persons having received the next highest, and an equal number of votes of the electoral districts, at the first trial for Vice President.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Bulous deceased, was taken up.

Mr. HUBBARD went into a full explanation of the merits of the case, and urged the immediate passage of the bill. Mr. H. called the attention of the Senate to the law of 1816, in relation to Indian depredations. By that act it was made necessary to inquire into the damage sustained, and to make a true report thereon; and when the law was complied with, payment was awarded to the claimants. The Government had appointed commissioners to inquire into the losses sustained, in the late war with the hostile tribes, who had made considerable progress, he believed, in Georgia, but not in Florida; the bill before the Senate was the same as that reported last session. The facts in the case were, that the plantation of Mr. Bulous was taken possession of by the American General commanding in Florida, and in consequence thereof was destroyed by the Seminoles. Mr. Bulous, who had taken up arms in defence of his country, had been killed. The principles involved in this case were precisely the same as those of claims allowed under the laws of 1816, and he thought Congress bound by every principle of law and justice to pass the bill.

Mr. KING said he did not pay particular attention to the case in question at the last session of Congress; if he had, he would have been more disposed to have voted for it then than now. So far from the United States soldiers having occupied property being the cause of its destruction, it was in many cases the means of its being saved; and the troops were often solicited to take possession, for the very purpose of preserving it. Government had appointed commissioners to go into that country, and ascertain the damage sustained, and make some estimate of the value of property destroyed; that commission was now in the discharge of that duty, and he presumed it would not be long before the Senate would have the report of the commissioners. At all events Mr. K. said, he was not disposed to act on an isolated case. If this mode of proceeding were adopted, the result would be, that some two or three claimants would be paid to the prejudice of others. He wished justice extended to all the claimants, and would go as far as any one in advocating it; but really, in the present state of the case, he thought it safer to postpone the further consideration of the bill for the present. Although he would make no motion to that effect, he submitted to the Senator (Mr. Hubbard) whether it would not be better for him to consent to such a proposition.

Mr. HUBBARD replied at some length. He thought the passage of the present bill would not interfere with any case, nor would it prejudice the claim of any individual. It came within the principle recognised by the Government for the last twenty years, and he hoped there would be no further delay, but that justice might at once be done to the claimant.

Mr. DAVIS said that the suggestions of the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. King,) were, in his opinion, entitled to much weight. Precedents might be established by a too hasty proceeding that might involve the country in an immense expense, and he would therefore move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama saw no reason why claimants ought not to be remunerated; but, in his opinion, the first object should be to ascertain how far Government was bound to indemnify individuals for their losses. Repeated applications had been made to the Department of War for forces to protect the property of the citizens, which, if attended to at the time, would, in all probability, have prevented these applications for indemnification; but it appeared that the Secretary paid more attention to the suggestions of those immediately around him, than to those who were acquainted with the state of the country; and hence property was consequently left unprotected. He was not now, however, disposed to discuss the question at present.

Mr. NILES thought it was proper to delay the subject until it could be looked at in all its various bearing. The Government had acted wisely in appointing commissioners to go into that country, and judge from personal observation, to obtain all the facts, all the precise circumstances on which the claims were founded, and then to make their report. He saw no reason why one case should be acted on, when a commission had been appointed to report on the whole subject. It might be that some delay would be occasioned to the sufferers, but, on the whole, it would be the wiser and safer policy, in his opinion, to postpone the bill.

The bill was laid on the table, when Mr. HUBBARD expressed his intention of calling it up in the ensuing week.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill to remit the duties on certain paper machines imported by Henry J. Pickering: read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill to remit the duties on certain goods destroyed by the great fire in New York, was read a third time; and, on motion of Mr. ROANE, (Mr. WRIGHT assenting,) was laid for the present on the table.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the bill allowing drawbacks on cordage made from imported hemp, having been read a third time, was postponed till to-morrow, with a view to extend the benefit of its provisions.

The bills for the relief of E. Town, and that for the relief of Erastus and Thadeus Fairbanks, were read a third time, and passed.

The bill to ascertain and designate the boundary line between Michigan and Wisconsin was discussed by Mr. NORVELL, LYON, and GRUNDY, was amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. By this amendment the plat of the boundary is made returnable to Congress at its next annual session.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to take up the bill relating to the District currency; when

Mr. KING said, as the Senate was not as full as he could wish it when a bill of such importance was to be discussed, he would move to postpone it until Tuesday next, and make it the order of the day for that time.

THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

Mr. BAYARD rose, and said that at the last regular session of Congress he had presented the resolution of the State which he had the honor in part to represent, against the defacement of the journal by what has been commonly called the Expunging Resolution, and at that time gave notice that he should at the ensuing session, and so long as he had the honor of a seat here, contend against that measure. When he gave that notice, appearances were much against the probability of success, but the dawn of a brighter and better day had broken upon us, which led him to hope the accomplishment of his purpose was near at hand. The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan) had, in the benevolence of his feelings, when he (Mr. Bayard) announced his intention of introducing a rescinding resolution at the last session, expressed his hope that he might live to see its adoption; meaning, no doubt, to bestow upon him a lengthened term of existence, if not an immortality, in the same spirit of complaisance in which a Spaniard wishes you may live a thousand years. But, Mr. B. said, he should be very sorry to have his life cut short as speedily as it was now probable that event would occur.

The resolution he presented was merely to rescind the expunging resolution, without professing to express any opinion on the merits of the original resolution of 1834. He contended against the right of expunction, and his purpose was solemnly to disavow that principle. He moved that the resolution which he now presented might be laid upon the table, and printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. B. then offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, the Senate of the United States, in the exercise of its functions as a deliberative assembly, did, on the 28th day of March, 1834, adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

And whereas, afterwards, to wit, on the 16th day of January, 1837, the Senate, in reference to the above resolution, adopted another as follows:

"Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the Journal; and, for that purpose, that the Secretary of the Senate, at such time as the Senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript Journal of the session of 1833-4 into the Senate, and, in the presence of the Senate, draw black lines round the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the words following: Expunged by order of the Senate, this 16th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1837."

And whereas the Constitution of the United States expressly requires that each House of Congress shall keep a journal of its proceedings, meaning thereby to preserve a faithful and permanent record of those proceedings:

And whereas the Senate of the United States, independently of its legislative, executive, and judicial functions, has the inherent right, as a deliberative assembly, to express its opinions, which can be done only by resolutions:

And whereas its opinions, when thus expressed, become part of its proceedings, of which the Constitution provides that a permanent record shall be kept:

And whereas the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837, and the act of the Secretary of the Senate in compliance with it, was a violation of the Constitution, inasmuch as, in legal contemplation, it destroyed, and in fact defaced, the record of the proceedings to which it refers: wherefore,

Resolved, That the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837, commonly called the expunging resolution, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded, and shall for ever hereafter be held as naught; and that, in all future publications of that portion of the Journal which contains the resolution of 1833-4, and in all copies which may hereafter be made of the same, for any official or legal purpose, the said resolution of 1833-4 shall be published and copied as it was originally entered upon the said Journal, without any notice whatever of the superscription, which was erroneously, irregularly, and unconstitutionally made, in pursuance of the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Senator from Delaware must desire a very long existence in this vale of tears, if he expected to live until what was asked by the resolution was adopted. The Senator has been pleased to say he would not be willing to die so soon. He certainly wished the Senator long life and prosperity; but to remain until his aim was accomplished, would be to render him miserable, unless he feasted on the Medean herb to renovate his youth. The gentleman has been pleased to allude to the dawning light which he fancies is beginning to glimmer on his political prospects. I admit (said Mr. B.) that there have been some few dark clouds in our Northern horizen; but we turn from them to the brilliant, sunny skies of the South, where all is bright and cheering. The gentleman and his friends are encouraged, I know, and I am willing they should hope on, having no disposition to throw obstacles in the way of their anticipations; but, unless I am more mistaken than I ever was in all my life, there will come a frost, a nipping frost—[Here some Senator observed "a killing"]—well, "a killing" frost, that will blight all their fair crop of hopes. I should not have made even this short reply, if the gentleman had not alluded to a quaint remark of mine, made at the last session.

The Senate then adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, December 14, 1837.

Mr. BRIGGS was announced as having been appointed to fill the vacancy in the Committee of Ways and Means, occasioned by the resignation of Mr. FLETCHER.

RELIEF OF DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

Mr. SMITH asked the consent of the House to take up the bill from the Senate authorizing the President of the United States to cause public vessels to cruise upon the coast in the winter season, and to relieve distressed seamen.

Some objections being heard—

Mr. WISE said he hoped no gentleman would persist in objecting, for it was very important that it should be passed as soon as possible, and, upon examination, he had found that this bill had no necessary connection with the provisions he wished to see adopted.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio inquired if the bill did not require to be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WISE said the bill involved no appropriation.

Mr. WHITTLESEY. But it involved a charge upon the Treasury.

The CHAIR decided its commitment to be unnecessary.

The bill was then taken up, without objection, ordered to a third reading, and then read the third and passed.

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, Dec. 15, 1837.

Mr. HAYNES asked the unanimous consent of the House to move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's Message.

Objection being made,

Mr. HAYNES moved a suspension of the rule; which was agreed to—ayes 119, noes 37.

Mr. OWENS gave notice that on Monday next he would ask leave to bring in a bill to provide for fixing the Northeastern boundary line.

REFERENCE OF THE MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the House then went into committee, Mr. ADAMS in the chair, on the President's Message.

Mr. HAYNES then submitted the resolutions offered by him some days since, with a modification.

The first and second resolutions were agreed to without a division, as follows:

1. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as refers to the political relations of the United States with foreign nations be committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2. Resolved, That so much of said Message as relates to the commerce of the United States with foreign nations be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The third resolution was then taken up as follows:

3. Resolved, That so much of said Message as relates to the finances, and every thing connected therewith; to the safe-keeping of the public moneys, and every thing connected therewith; and so much thereof as relates to the Bank of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to the mover that the questions submitted to Congress by the President, in reference to the reissue of the notes of the old Bank of the United States, belonged rather to the Judiciary Committee than to that of Ways and Means. He therefore moved to strike out that part of the resolution relating to the Bank of the United States, and moved a fourth resolution as follows:

4. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the reissuing of the notes of the late Bank of the United States, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WISE said he cared nothing about the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and he rose to object to this third resolution in the whole.

The CHAIR (Mr. Adams) reminded the gentleman that the amendment would alone be pending, and it would not, therefore, be strictly in order to debate the whole resolution at that time.

Mr. WISE would postpone his remarks for the present.

Mr. HAYNES accepted the modification of the third resolution; and the question recurring thereon,

Mr. WISE spoke at length against the resolution, and in reference to the various portions of the Message having relation to the subject of the finances. Mr. W. was opposed to any reference of this subject, unless it might be to a committee of one from each State; and he expressed his dissent to both of the plans adverted to in the Message—the Sub-Treasury and the Special Deposite system.

Mr. HAYNES said it was not his design to have said a single word on the subject of the resolutions, prepared by him, before the House. But in relation to the resolution referring to the finances, he had strong doubts as to whether the last clause, which had been withdrawn by him, might not have been more properly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as suggested in the modification proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He, Mr. H. could not refrain from expressing his surprise at the course pursued by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) who had remarked at such length on matters not then before the House, the question pending being one of mere reference. He considered a great portion of the gentleman's speech as entirely irrelevant and foreign to the subject before them, and he would not attempt to follow the gentleman through his unnecessary and irrelevant remarks, but hoped that nothing would be said but what was applicable to the question before them.

Mr. BOON said he had not risen for the purpose of making a speech, but simply to express his great astonishment at witnessing the terrible fluttering among the "wounded pigeons," that had been produced by a simple proposition to have referred to one of the standing committees of the House a portion of the President's annual message to Congress. Why (inquired Mr. B.) all this bustle and alarm in the ranks of the modern Whig party, if it be true, as has been stated by the Opposition, that the measures recommended by the President have been disapproved and condemned by the people? We are told that the people are opposed to the Sub-Treasury scheme as recommended by the present Chief Magistrate; and the late local elections in New York, and some few other States, had been adverted to, as proof positive of the will of the people touching the Sub-Treasury scheme. One would be led to believe, from the declarations of the Whigs, that the little Magician, as they are pleased to call the President, was, to use a common phrase, literally "used up" in several of the States. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the oft-repeated declarations of the Opposition be true in this respect, why the necessity of endeavoring to increase the excitement in the country, which is already too highly excited, by additional exciting and alarming speeches being made here, and sent forth to the country, before the President's Message had been referred to the appropriate standing committees of the House, and before any report having been made thereon? Mr. B. said that he viewed such a course of proceeding not only unfair toward the Administration, but as being without a precedent in the history of any former Congressional proceedings, and could not, therefore, be productive of any beneficial results to the people and the country. But, sir, we are told that the Administration and its friends are running counter to the sovereign will of the people. Mr. B. said there was not a public man living, who held the sovereign will of his constituents in any higher or greater reverence and respectful awe than he himself did; yet he felt disinclined to be seen playing off the part of a political demagogue in that House or elsewhere. He would, he said, on all questions of public policy, endeavor faithfully to represent the will of his constituents, whenever made known to him; and he presumed that there was not a member of that House who would intentionally misrepresent the will or the wishes of his immediate constituents. Mr. B. said that he was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Haynes) that of referring the subject of the public revenue, and every thing connected therewith, to the Committee of Ways and Means; and when that committee shall have made their report to the House, it would then be competent for the majority of the House to adopt or reject the same, either in whole or in part. A different course, said Mr. B. would only tend to delay the final action of the House upon the great and exciting question as to the future safe-keeping of the public revenue.

Mr. B. added, that he had a few words to say in conclusion, in reply to some remarks which had just been uttered by the member from Massachusetts, (Mr. Reed) who had last addressed the committee. That gentleman, in his attack upon the late and present Administrations of the General Government, stated in his place, that this Government would no doubt lose a very considerable amount of the public revenue which had been deposited by order of the late Administration in the State banks. We are told that the Treasury of the United States is now bankrupt, and that the Government is in danger of losing a very considerable amount of the public money now on deposite in the State banks!

Sir, from what party does this suspicion and charge of bank delinquency come? Does it come from any friend of the late or present Administration? No, sir: it comes from a leader of the modern Whig party! This suspicion and charge of State bank delinquency comes with a bad grace from the bank Whigs themselves. When President Jackson caused the money of the people to be deposited in the Whig banks for safe-keeping, he then thought and believed, as I did myself, and others who favored the measure, that the managers of those "Whig" banks were honest men, and that they would not, by any possible means, defraud the Government and the people out of one cent of their money.

Mr. B. said that eighty-eight State and local banks had been selected by the late Administration as depositories of the public revenue, and of that number he would hazard the declaration, without official information being given, that at least eighty-five of those deposite banks were under the control and management of "Whigs." The public moneys of the people, thus deposited for safe-keeping, are in the hands of the "Whigs," and if any portion of it should be lost to the Government, it it would be justly chargeable to the dishonesty of the "Whig" banks, and those who control and manage the operations of those institutions, and not to any act of the late or present Administrations of the General Government, as has been charged by the modern "Whigs."

The debate was continued by Messrs. BOND, REED and EWING; when, without taking the question, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee rose and reported, and the first two resolutions were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, it was Resolved, That, when the House adjourn this day, it shall adjourn till Monday next.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, the use of the hall, to-morrow, at 11 o'clock, was granted to the Rev. Mr. Wolff. Mr A. prefaced his motion by some eloquent remarks on the objects and mission of Mr. Wolff.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication in relation to some private claim; which, on motion of Mr. REED, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, from the Commissioner on the Public Buildings, a report of the expenditures thereon during the present year; which, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, was laid on the table.

The message from the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee on enrolled bills, was taken up, and concurred in.

Two bills from the Senate, viz:

1. An act for the relief of Elisha Towns, and

2. An act for the relief of Erastus Fairbanks and Thaddens Fairbanks, were taken up, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act entitled "An act for the relief of John P. Becker," passed March 3d, 1837, so as to allow the said Becker a pension of ninety-six dollars per annum.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Postmaster General to pay to Elisha Jackson, of Virginia, the amount of the drafts drawn on the 29th day of December, 1834, by William Smith, late mail contractor, in favor of said Jackson: one for $237, payable the 1st day of August, 1835; another for $237, payable the 1st day of November, 1835; and another for $237, payable the 1st day of February, 1836; which were duly accepted by the treasurer of the department, and have been protested for non-payment.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, Dec. 18, 1837.

As soon as the Journal was read,

Mr. BRIGGS rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: A few days since my colleague was excused from serving on the Committee of Ways and Means of this House. The Speaker did me the honor of appointing me to fill the vacancy occasioned by his withdrawal. The circumstances under which that vacancy occurred, which I deeply regret, seem to render it improper that I should occupy the place on that important committee. This, with perhaps one or two exceptions, is the opinion of all my colleagues from Massachusetts. I therefore, sir, respectfully decline the appointment, and ask the House to excuse me from serving.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, Dec. 18, 1837.

Mr. CALHOUN, appeared and took his seat.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to a resolution of the 3d February last, relative to alledged abuses in the importation of goods charged in a letter from M. Dodge. The Secretary states that the abuses were inquired into, but answers had only been received in one instance.

Mr. KING did not see that any thing of consequence would have been elicited if the questions set forth had been answered; he would, however, move that it lie on the table and be printed, as it might be called up hereafter, if necessary: agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT also presented a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 13th October last, showing the condition of the Navy Pension fund; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings: laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from sundry citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, without distinction of party, representing the ruinous consequences of the paper system, and praying that all banks may be dispensed with: ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance. Also, from sundry citizens of Philadelphia, praying the erection of a new custom-house: referred to the Committee on Commerce. Also, two memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania against the annexation of Texas: laid on the table. Also, from the trustees of Alleghany College, praying for a grant of land; also, in relation to the Erie road: both of which were appropriately referred.

Mr. WALL presented a memorial from twelve men and thirteen women, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the United States.

Mr. PRESTON rose to make a single remark. It appeared to him that political philanthropists were endeavoring to force this subject upon the attention of Congress, at least it would appear so from the number of memorials that were continually pouring in upon the Senate. He gave notice that he would at an early day, a very early day, introduce a joint resolution that would place that subject at rest.

Mr. WALL said he had no further object in view in the presentation of these petitions, than to do his duty to his constituents, and was not desirous of doing any thing to provoke debate.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of 115 ladies, inhabitants of Gloucester county, in the State of New Jersey, praying the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. These petitioners, he would add, so far from being actuated by the spirit of fanaticism, were, he was convinced, very sincere and conscientious in what they desired. He would move to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. MORRIS asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAY wished the motion withdrawn for a moment. It was manifest that the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia was extending itself in the public mind, and daily engaging more and more of the public attention. His opinions, as expressed in the Legislature of the country, were, he believed, perfectly well known. He had no hesitation in saying that Congress ought not to do what was asked by the petitioners without the consent of the people of the District of Columbia. He was desirous of inquiring of the Senator from New Jersey, or any other conversant with the subject, whether the feeling of abolition in the abstract was extending itself in their respective States, or whether it was not becoming mixed up with other matters—such, for instance, in the belief that the sacred right of petition had been assailed. It became the duty of the Senate to inquire into this business, and understand the subject well.

There were many, no doubt, of these petitioners, who did not mean to assert that slavery should be abolished, that were contending for what they understood to be a great constitutional right. Would it not, then, under this view of the subject, be the best course to allay excitement, and endeavor to calm down and tranquilize the public mind? Would it not be wiser to refer the subject to the Committee for the District of Columbia, or some other committee, that would elicit all the facts, reason coolly and dispassionately, presenting the subject in all its bearings to the citizens of non-slaveholding States, and in a manner worthy of the great subject: would not such a proceeding be well calculated to insure harmony and amity in all parts of the Union. On this subject there was, he was aware, great diversity of opinion, and he rose merely for the purpose of making these suggestions to the Senate.

Mr. WALL said he did not believe, so far as his State was concerned, that the feeling for abolition was on the increase; but he did believe the subject was mixed up with the right of petition: many of the petitioners believing that right was invaded by the manner in which these memorials were treated. He thought if this matter had been in the onset referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and a report made therefrom, (sanctioned by the Senate,) calmly expressing the feeling of the American people, that there would have been no further trouble. There was no disposition on the part of these people to interfere with the rights of the States; there was nothing offensive in their petitions; he would undertake to say, not an objectionable word; they were merely acting in accordance with what they believed a right in relation to the District of Columbia, over which they believe Congress has jurisdiction.

Mr. CALHOUN, said he had foreseen what this subject would come to; he knew its origin, and that it lay deeper than was supposed. It grew out of a spirit of fanaticism, which was daily increasing, and if not met in limine would by-and-by dissolve this Union. It was particularly our duty to keep the matter out of the Senate, out of the halls of the National Legislature. Teese fanatics were interfering with what they had no right. Grant the reception of these petitions and you will next be asked to act on them. He was for no conciliatory course, no temporising; instead of yielding one inch he would rise in opposition, and he hoped every man from the South would stand by him to put down this growing evil. These was but one question that would ever destroy this Union, and that was involved in this principle. Yes: this was potent enough for it, and must be early arrested if the Union was to be preserved. A man must see little into what is going on, if he did not perceive that this spirit was growing, and that the rising generation was becoming more strongly imbued with it. It was not to be stopped by reports on paper, but by action, and very decided action.

Mr. SWIFT said he had been entrusted with various memorials of a similar character to this; and he, therefore felt called on to say a few words. When these petitions were referred, as was the former practice, to the Committee for the District, there was very little excitement on the subject. There was a great difference of opinion on the subject, some thinking that slavery in the District ought to be abolished by Congress, and others thinking differently; but from the moment that the petitions were refused, to the present time, the excitement had been continually increasing. And the petitioners were not the miserable fanatics which the Senator from South Carolina supposed; they were among the most intelligent and respectable of the community; and the Legislature of Vermont had adopted resolutions on this subject, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives, to urge the subject on the consideration of Congress.

[Mr. CUTHBERT asked whether the Legislature asked Congress to indulge the full right of petition, or to abolish slavery in the District.]

Mr. S. resumed. The Legislature had asserted the right of Congress to abolish slavery in the District; but Mr. S. firmly believed that if the petitions had been referred to the District committee, as formerly, for them to report upon them, it would, in a great measure, have allayed the excitement. The most of the petitioners were not those generally called abolitionists; and they would have probably had no feelings on the subject, if the former course of referring the petitions had been pursued. Neither was it a question of party in Vermont; but men of all parties were engaged on the subject, and on this subject they could unite. Mr. S. hoped the suggestion of Mr. Clay would prevail.

Mr. ROANE, of Virginia, said, that warm, ardent, and strong as were all his feelings, and fixed as was his opinion, on this subject, he should perhaps not have opened his lips on the present most unexpected occasion, but for the relation he happens to bear towards the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which it is proposed to refer this whole subject. It is one of vast importance, involving the dearest rights and interests of millions of our citizens, and perhaps the Union of these States. A committee, raised to take charge of the local concerns of the people of this District is not, I humbly apprehend, the suitable committee for such a subject. That committee was not constituted with reference to questions of such magnitude and extensive bearing; and I do trust that, should this body unfortunately agree to receive and refer these petitions, with a view, as we are informed, to have a calm, deliberate, and full discussion of their merits, they will send them to some other committee—nay, raise a special committee, composed of gentlemen who have the talent and the taste for such discussion; for I take this occasion to say that, neither in committee nor elsewhere, will I ever consent to argue and discuss the merits of this tender and vital question. No, sir; when my life and my property are assailed, I protect them not by argument and discussion.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) has asked whether the multiplication of these petitions in the North, and the spread of feeling which prompts them, is not mainly attributable to a belief, on the part of the people there, that the great right of petition has been invaded by the direction which this body has given to them for the last two years? He has been answered in the affirmative by the Senator from Vermont, (Mr. Swift,) and it is utterly denied that fanaticism constitutes any part of the spirit which actuates our Northern brethren, in thus eternally stirring a question which they must know is vital to us of the South. Oh, no—it is not fanaticism, it is not humanity, it is not philanthropy, but it is patriotism! it is only to assert and maintain inviolate the great right of petition! I perceive, sir, that one of the petitions presented this morning is signed by, I think, one hundred and eleven women. Allow me to ask when before, on what other occasion, on what other great question, have the females thought it their imperious duty to step forth as the asserters and champions of the great right of petition? Allow me to believe, sir, that such a motive constituted no part of their feelings, never for one moment entered into their brain; no, sir, it is the false fire of philanthropy, so easily kindled in their warm and tender hearts, and too easily fanned into flame by fanatical, vile, and designing men.

No man, sir, in this wide extended empire, more dearly loves, or would more sacredly guard, than I, the great, the inestimable right of petition, as asserted and practised in England, and thence engrafted into our own written Constitution; but, like all other good things, it is liable to abuse, and has its limits; and I for one am bold to say, that the subject now before the Senate presents a limit to this right. The people have a right peaceably to assemble and petition—for what? To take away my right to enjoy "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?" No, sir: but to redress grievances; grievances to which the law-making power can apply a remedy or corrective. The petitions must not only be sent to a tribunal competent to hear them, but must relate to a subject on which that tribunal can legally and authoritatively act. Sir, the people are occluded; they have occluded themselves; they are occluded by the sacred compromises of the Constitution—the charter of all their rights—from bringing this subject before Congress in any manner whatever as one of ordinary legislation. It is in vain to say that this right of petition has no limits. We have been told this morning, that we are the servants of the people; yet we —this Senate—requires that every petition which is offered to it, shall be respectful, in its language and decorous in its form. This, sir, is a limit; and one liable to abuse; and why not, I seek to know, require that they shall also be pertinent in their matter and legitimate in their object?

I ask gentlemen who are so sensitive in their feelings, and so latitudinous in their notions, about the right of petition, what they will do if a "respectful" petition was presented to the Senate, praying them to pass a law, directing that, in future, each one of our twenty-six sovereign States should have on this floor but one instead of two Senators, as guarantied, ay, compromised, by the Constitution? Is there a member here who would not scout from this chamber such a petition, as going far beyond any thing contemplated by the terms or spirit of our association? The right of petition, as secured in the Constitution, was intended to redress all grievances within the pale of the law and the Constitution, but not to subvert either.

We are told, sir, that these petitions only relate to the District of Columbia. Who, sir, that has at all looked at passing events can for a moment believe this statement? Who can believe that the humanity, the philanthropy, or the patriotism of our Northern brethren can be sated by emancipating the few slaves who inhabit this ten miles square? No, sir, this nondescript District of Colnmbia, because of some plausible constructions given to certain equivocal expressions about the "exclusive jurisdiction of Congress" has been adroitly made the nucleus around which the abolitionists are to rally their forces for a concentrated movement on the States. It is here, sir, in this District, that they wish to enter the wedge, with which they would rend asunder this great and glorious Union.

Sir, said Mr. R. we have been told by the Senator from Vermont that, on this question, there is no division of sentiment in his State; that on this only question, all parties in politics, and all sects in religion, come together and agree. Sir, let me inform that Senator, and the whole North, that the entire country south of the Potomac, without any regard whatever to party, or any thing else, is as firmly united as can possibly be the people of Vermont, and will boldly face and defy the storm of abolition, come when and whence it may. Gentlemen may talk as they will about the right of petition, and all that, but the very fact which the Senator from Vermont has stated, proves incontrovertibly to my mind, that this question is solely and wholly one of power and aggrandizement; to which politics, religion, morality, and patriotism are all subservient; I repeat, sir, that it is a struggle for power—I cannot view it otherwise. I did not intend or expect to have said so much.

Mr. PRENTISS said that he entirely concurred in the representation which his colleague had made in relation to the state of public opinion in Vermont. He had no doubt that the public mind had become much more agitated, and that the number of those disposed to favor the views of the petitioners had greatly increased within a year or two past; and he had as little doubt that the increased excitement on the subject, and consequent accession of strength to the abolitionists, as they were called, had arisen, in no inconsiderable degree, from the course which had been pursued in this and the other House in relation to the petitions which had been presented to Congress. How had the petitions been treated here? At one time they were received, and then the prayer rejected instanter, without a hearing, without consideration. This mere formal reception, followed with an immediate and instantaneous rejection of the prayer of the petitions, the people of the North had regarded as trifling with their rights, as substantially a refusal to receive the petitions, and, consequently, a denial of the right to petition. More recently the form had been changed. Now, a motion to receive was necessary, which was immediately followed by a motion to lay that motion on the table. Now, said Mr. P. to the plain common sense of the people of the State he represented, this proceeding was nothing more or less than a refusal to receive the petitions. It was this infringement of a constitutional right which had done much to agitate the public mind. Many who had signed petitions were influenced mainly by that consideration. Their purpose was to assert and maintain the right to petition, and they would persist in sending petitions here until that right was fully recognised, by treating the petitions with the same respect as petitions on other subjects are treated.

Mr. NILES remarked that he had no wish to prolong this debate, or to participate in it. His only object was to put himself right, and explain the reasons which would influence his vote. He considered that the Senate had, during the last regular session, by inattention, fallen into a course of disposing of these petitions inconsistent with their deliberate decision made two years ago, after long debate. At that time, a petition praying for the abolition of slavery in this District was presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Buchanan,) and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) objected to its being received, and moved that it be not received. This motion was debated for several weeks, and finally decided against the motion, or, that the petition be received, by a very large majority. It was then moved that the prayer of the petition be rejected, which prevailed also by a large majority. Whilst this motion was pending, and the discussion going on, other similar petitions were offered, and the like motion made, that they be not received; and it was then moved that that motion be laid on the table which was adopted. But this was not considered as a final disposition of the petitions, but only a temporary disposition of them, until the question under debate was decided. These petitions, however, were not afterwards called up. This temporary disposition of this class of petitions two years ago, seems to have led to a similar course the last session as a final disposal of them.

Mr. N. said he did not last session vote to lay the motion to receive a petition on the table, as a final disposition of the petition, as he considered it equivalent to a vote to refuse to receive the petition. He regarded it as only an indirect way of excluding petitions. A petition cannot be received when objected to, without the consent of the Senate. A motion is made to obtain such consent, and that motion is indefinitely postponed, or, what is equivalent, is laid on the table, with the understanding that it is not to be taken up again. Of course, the petition is not received; it cannot be received without the consent of the body, and that consent is not given, but is virtually refused.

He could not give his sanction to a proceeding of this kind, which seemed to him to be in direct violation of the solemn and deliberate decision of the Senate two years ago. He had no objections to such a disposition of these petitions as was made two years since; to receive them, and then reject the prayer, or lay the petitions on the table. Still, in his opinion, a different course would be preferable. We all have the same object; we only differ as to the means of attaining it. We all desire to allay the excitement on this subject, to quiet and tranquillize the public mind, and to stop a course of proceedings which can do no good, and tend to much mischief. In answer to the inquiry which had been made as to the state of public opinion on the abolition question at the North, he was sorry to say that the spirit of abolition appeared to be extending. He did not think it was increasing much in his own State, but thought it was spreading in many of the eastern States. In a recent election in a neighboring State, the candidate for the Chief Executive office of one party, and the prevailing one, was understood to be an abolitionist; and this seems to have been regarded as so far a recommendation that the candidate of the other party was induced to publicly declare that he was in favor of abolishing slavery in this District. From these facts, he inferred that abolition opinions of some sort prevailed very extensively in the State referred to. If he was incorrect, the gentleman from Massachusetts could set him right. The course pursued the last two years in regard to abolition petitions, does not appear to have checked that spirit; but from that, or some cause, it has increased; and he believed it would be wiser to refer these petitions, and obtain a sound, candid, but strong report, setting forth the reasons against abolishing slavery in this District. Are we to presume that the people will not be influenced by facts, by reasons and arguments? We are a thinking and a reasoning people; and all our institutions and all our rights rest on public opinion. He did not despair that even this delicate and difficult question might be settled and put at rest, before the great tribunal of public opinion.

Mr. STRANGE expressed his regret that this discussion had arisen: he regretted, also, to hear it asserted that the abolition principle had extended itself; but he thought that that circumstance was no sufficient reason for receiving the petitions in question. It might be, as it had been asserted, that those who were not fanatics favored those principles, but for his part he maintained that the whole of the agitation proceeded from the mere spirit of fanaticism. As to the constitutional right alleged to exist, it had not fallen under his observation, upon a close examination of the Constitution. [Mr. S. here cited the constitutional provision, "Congress shall pass no law," &c.]

This part of the Constitution (Mr. S. maintained) was not at all violated by the disposition made of these petitions. Congress was left free as to all petitions when presented. It had an undoubted right to exercise its discretion upon the merits of all petitions. It would be merely farcical to receive the petitions, or to inquire whether their prayer should be granted; for there did not exist a single individual in Congress who was prepared to grant the prayer of these petitioners. No benefit, therefore, whatever could result; whereas, great evils would flow from the agitation of the question consequent upon their reception. A great proportion of Southern people are excited dangerously and fatally; thoughts are raised which otherwise would never be entertained in the South. With these views, he should renew the motion to lay upon the table.

Several Senators intimating a desire to speak,

Mr. STRANGE withdrew his motion for the present.

Mr. DAVIS took this occasion to repeat an observation made by him two years ago, viz: "if you wish to make abolitionists, then only continue to pursue the course you have hitherto pursued." No course, in his opinion, could be more surely calculated to increase the excitement already existing than the rejection of these petitions. How the practice of laying these petitions on the table on the objections of any member, had crept into the Senate, he (Mr. D.) could not conceive. To him it, however, was the same thing, whether these petitions were laid on the table or whether they were merely received, and then rejected: it was in either way tantamount to a total rejection: it was an infraction of the sacred right of petition. He (Mr. D.) did not doubt that this attack on the right of petition had multiplied greatly the number of petitioners. To call them all fanatics was most unjust; they were irritated on to petition by the violation of their rights of petitioning. Before war was made by Congress on the right of petitioning, this excitement was not in existence; it had been raised and created by the opposition, by the resistance, and by the particular and invidious discrimination made with respect to these petitions. So long as petitioners were treated respectfully, no excitement had prevailed. Change, therefore, your course, said Mr. D. treat the petitioners as other petitioners, receive their petitions, and the excitement will be allayed.

As to the merits of this matter, no doubt southern gentlemen have come to their conclusions that the petitioners have no right to come here, in a manner satisfactory to themselves; but if this be true, he would ask, would it not be most expedient to meet them in limine, at once, and say that they have no right, or else to give their prayer due consideration, and give at least some reasons, if there exist any, against the right which they claim? They believe that Congress has the power and control over this subject in this District; and, if it be so, where is the impropriety in their coming here? Be their opinion right or wrong, it is their opinion and belief that Congress has the right and the power and the duty of controlling this matter in this District.

Their prayer is reasonable, temperate, and just; it is two-fold, 1st, abolish slavery in this District, or, if not, pass at least laws to regulate in a better manner the slave trade in this District. They disavow the intention of interfering with slavery in any of the States. Such a principle is deliberately avowed in the resolutions of most, if not all, the Abolition Societies in the North. They have no purpose of interfering with the rights of the South. The documents they have published to the world would prove this. If their proceedings agitate the minds of Southern gentlemen, that is their own fault; it is because they choose rather to interfere with the Abolition Societies, and not that the Abolition Societies interfere with them. But let us grant even that the Constitution is totally silent as to the right of petition, yet who is there can doubt the right. It is a solecism in terms; it would be absurd to suppose that the petitioners have not a right to come before the Government and demand their rights. Government is the servant of the people, and it is its business to attend to the prayers and demands of the people, its masters.

No case can be supposed to justify the rejection of the right of petitioning. If men petition for only two Senators, as the Senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) has supposed a case, why, let them do so. The right is not to be put down on supposed cases of abusing it. The member from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) says, will you deliberate where your mind is made up? He (Mr. Davis) would immediately answer "yes!" It is due to the country to meet this subject with deliberation, and to send forth the reasons of our rejection of the prayer of two-thirds of the population. But how can you do this, if you refuse to deliberate at all upon the subject? The course Congress had hitherto pursued had created alarm and augmented excitement.

Mr. KING said that some sessions past, he had advocated the reception of petitions of this description: he would concisely state his reasons for having then been in favor of such a course. He considered them as coming from a miserable set of fanatics and deluded females, who were too contemptible to excite apprehension. He was unwilling to give them weight, by adding to their number those who might honestly believe the right of petition had been denied. For many years petitions of this character were received without comment, referred to a committee, and no further notice taken of them. They slumbered until the close of the session, and the committee was then discharged from the further consideration of them. Mr. K. regretted most sincerely that this unfortunate question, so intimately connected with the permanency of this Union, was pressed by gentlemen upon the consideration of the Senate. They urge their reception: for what purpose? For none other under Heaven, that he could perceive, than to produce excitement; to irritate and inflame the public mind. So long as it was confined to deluded females and fanatics, it was of little import; but now it has entered into the politics of the country. Mr. K. had recently seen interrogatories addressed to persons, candidates for high offices, to learn how far they were prepared to sustain those who were industriously laboring to destroy the rights of the South; and he could not express his astonishment when he found such men degrading themselves by condescending to give an answer. Yes, said Mr. K. it has entered into the politics of the country: unprincipled aspirants have seized on it, and it has, from that cause alone, become alarming. Mr. K. feared not the great mass of the people, even in New England: they were sound to the core. Not so with the politicians: they were sinning against light and knowledge. They desired, and should receive, the stern rebuke of this body; and their efforts to elevate themselves at the expense of the Union should be promptly put down. He would not receive or give any countenance to these incendiary p titions.

Mr. DAVIS, in explanation, said he would not suffer himself to be excited by any observations made in reference to himself. He gave way to no one in a desire of maintaining harmony; and his remarks were not made, as imputed to him, in the view of creating discord. He wished the member from Alabama (Mr. King) was better informed of the great respectability of the petitioners; if he (Mr. K.) could but know the real state of things in the North, he would not speak so contemptuously of the petitioners. As to politicians, Mr. D. maintained that until the question came on here, no politics were mixed up with the subject in any way whatever. It was a question of conscience, of morals, of propriety; men of all parties concurred in these petitions; there was no intermixture of interested politicians, as the gentleman had presumed.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he was not aware that any petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia had ever originated in that part of New Hampshire where he resided. He was certain that since he had been a member of the Senate he had not been called upon to present to the Senate any such memorial. And, since he had been a member of Congress, very few petitions in relation to this subject had been forwarded to him from any section of the State he had the honor, in part to represent. If such memorials had come hither from New Hampshire, they must have been committed to the care of others. He was assured that the prevailing sentiment with the people of his own State was, to let this whole matter alone; that it was a subject with which they had no concern; that it was their bounden duty, as good and peaceable citizens, not to interfere with the rights of others; that they regarded the question of slavery as a sectional, a local question; and however much they might regret its existence in any portion of this Union, yet they well knew that its existence was sanctioned by the Constitution of the land; and with the continuation of its existence in those parts of the Confederacy, they ought not, and they could not, with propriety, make any interference, unsolicited and unasked by those whose interests were affected by it. These were the sentiments of his own State; they certainly were, to a great extent, the opinions of the people of New Hampshire. He was perfectly aware that this was an exciting subject; a subject which addressed itself to the passions, the prejudices, the feelings of the community, and, he was sorry to add, it was assuming, as far as he understood its course, a political character, he would not say exclusively so, but it would not be denied that a great proportion, a decided majority, of those who professed to be abolitionists, were among the opponents of the present Administration. This, most assuredly, was the fact within the limits of his own State. He had said, with much truth, that this was an exciting subject, and nothing could tend more effectually to keep alive the excitement than this and similar discussions in either House of Congress. The public mind should be unagitated, undisturbed, by any debate on this subject within this hall. If the Senate should pursue steadily such a course, in his judgment, quiet and tranquillity would inevitably be the result. The Senators from Vermont and Massachusetts have both said that the course pursued by the Senate for the last two years with reference to these memorials, had tended greatly to augment the number and the zeal of the abolitionists. It may be so. He was not aware, however, of any increased engagedness upon this subject within the limits of his own State. He could not say to what extent the excitement existed on the other side of the Connecticut, within the limits of Vermont, and he was equally ignorant as to the true state of abolitionism within the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. For himself, he felt a pride and a pleasure in repeating that the feeling of New Hampshire was to let this subject alone. He had, on a former occasion, very fully expressed his views in relation to this matter. That occasion must be fresh in the recollection of the Senate. It was on the presentation of a certain memorial by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, from the Society of Friends, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade within the District of Columbia. The subject was long before the Senate; it was much debated; one of the questions involved in that debate was the right of the people to petition Congress for the redress of grievances, and the duty of Congress to receive and dispose of their memorials. Another question involved in that debate was, what ought to be done with memorials and petitions for the abolition of slavery? How should these be disposed of? These questions were fully discussed and debated by many of the members of the Senate.

He then advocated the right of petition. He then maintained that the right was sacred and absolute in the constituent—that the very Constitution of our free and representative Government presupposed the existence of such a right in the people. That it was the duty of Congress to receive all proper memorials and petitions presented in respectful language. And he also, on that occasion, contended that it would be manifestly unjust to interfere with the question of slavery in this District, unasked and unsolicited by the inhabitants of this District. Since that time, the Legislature of his native State had had the subject of slavery generally, and particularly slavery as it exists in this District, under their consideration. It was referred to a select committee, and that committee had made a full report, and had recommended the adoption of certain resolutions. The report and the resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire were before him, and he was happy in adding that they fully sustained him in the course he had previously pursued. Before he adverted to those resolutions, he would say a word or two upon the subject now immediately claiming the consideration of the Senate. The question proposed now does not, as he regarded it, at all interfere with the right of petition. It does not deny that right; and, so far from taking any such course, the Senate had, on another occasion, by its express vote, asserted that right. The Senator from Kentucky himself advocated the propriety of receiving this particular petition for the avowed purpose of reference; for the express object of drawing from the Committee for the District of Columbia an argument against the prayer of the memorialists. He has not said that a vote in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee would in effect take from the memorialists the right of petition. But his wish seemed to be to get a report, an argument against the object of this memorial. When the petition presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania was under consideration, it was ordered to be received by the vote of the Senate, and the prayer of the same memorial was, on the motion of the same Senator, rejected by a vote of 34 to 6. The Senate received the memorial, it is true, and instantly voted to reject it. His friend from Connecticut (Mr. Niles) voted with him on that occasion, and he was well satisfied that that gentleman was as much opposed to the prayer of these memorialists as any member of this Senate.

He could not be ignorant of the views of that Senator. He voted to receive the petition, and he also voted at the same time to reject the prayer of the petition. For the last twenty years, in both Houses of Congress, the course pursued has been a very decided indication that the abolition of slavery in this District, as petitioned for by this class of memorialists, ought not to receive favorable consideration. In both Houses these petitions had been committed to the Committee for the District of Columbia. They had quietly remained with that committee till near the close of the session, when the committee had asked to be discharged from their further consideration. These memorials had in many instances been received and ordered to lie on the table. In only one instance, according to his recollection, within the last twenty years, had these memorials elicited from either House of Congress a special report; and that able report had been sent forth to the American people very recently. But it had produced no effect upon the abolitionists. Within the last two sessions, the course of the Senate has uniformly been, on the presentation of these memorials, to check discussion upon them at once. A motion has been made, or what was equivalent thereto, that the memorials be not received, and instantly some Senator moves to lay that motion on the table The effect of this proceeding is to cut off debate and that is the whole effect of it. If the motion be adopted, the memorial is necessarily received, and goes upon the files of the Senate.

The Senator from Connecticut objects to this course because he says it impairs the right of petition. He says he would receive and then vote to lay them on the table, or he would receive and vote as he has heretofore done to reject the prayer. The course now proposed was in his judgment no denial of the right of petition, nor was it any infringement of that right. It was merely saying what the Senate had repeatedly said, and what the other House of Congress had repeatedly said, that this subject, presented to their consideration as it was, ought not to receive the favorable action of the Senate. It was merely saying at this time, under existing circumstances, the Senate deem it inexpedient to act upon these memorials. This is all that can fairly be inferred from the vote to lay the motion of reception on the table. And in his judgment it was no more disrespectful to the memorialists than the course which was formerly adopted, viz: to receive and to lay on the table—to receive and reject the prayer; and from the view which he had taken upon this subject, he was unable to see the force of the objections urged by his friend from Connecticut. The adoption of the motion proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, cannot, in his view, be considered as equivalent to a vote against the reception of the memorial. As he had observed, if the proposed motion is adopted, the memorial is received and placed on the files of the Senate. The whole effect of this motion is, then, to preclude debate; that the Senate deem it inexpedient at this time to legislate on this subject; to lay the whole matter upon the table; to do precisely in effect what the Senate has invariably done with this class of memorials—to refuse to comply with or to yield to the wishes of the memorialists. He would now, in conclusion, ask leave to read the following resolutions which were adopted by the Legislature of his own State at their session in January, 1837:

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened, That we recognise the constitutional right of the several States of the Union to exercise exclusive jurisdiction within their own limits, on the subject of domestic slavery.

"Be it further resolved, That Congress cannot, without a violation of public faith, abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, unless upon the request of the citizens of that District, and of the States by whom that territory was ceded to the General Government.

"Be it further resolved, That as the Union of the States can only be maintained by abstaining from all interference with the laws, domestic policy, and peculiar interests of every other State, the conduct of those who would coerce our fellow-citizens in other States into abolition of slavery, by inflammatory appeals addressed to the fears of the masters and the passions of the slaves, is in the highest degree censurable, as tending to alienate one portion of our countrymen from another, and to introduce discord into our sister States, and as a violation of that spirit of compromise in which the Constitution was framed, and a due observance of which is necessary to the safety of the Union."

The first resolution was adopted with great unanimity, and the second by a vote of one hundred and twenty-four to twenty-one. And he verily believed that the result of the vote upon those resolutions was a fair index of popular opinion in that State as to the power of Congress over the subject of slavery generally, and particularly upon the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia. According to the sentiment of New Hampshire, it would be a violation of the public faith to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, unless upon the request of the citizens of this District, and of the States by whom this District was ceded to the General Government. He fully concurred in this opinion, and until there shall be such a request from this District, and from the States of Virginia and Maryland, communicated to Congress, any action upon the subject of abolishing slavery in this District would be founded in manifest injustice.

Mr. NILES, in explanation of his former remarks, said he did not approve of crooked courses. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Hubbard) says that the petition is before us if we lay it on the table, and that so far, it is received; and yet he says that, by laying it on the table, the petition is rejected. He (Mr. N.) could not reconcile this contradiction. He wished the petition to be received; and he would like to have a good and wholesome report from a committee of the Senate made upon it.

Mr. RIVES replied to the argument, that receiving the petition, and having a report made, would quiet the excitement. Not so: this had been already done two years ago. Then, in the other House, a select committee, composed chiefly of northern men, had presented an elaborate report, and this had been so far from allaying the excitement, that now gentlemen come forward and tell us that the excitement is increased; therefore, it would be perfectly nugatory to go round the same circle again. To him (Mr. R.) it appeared that the most pacificatory course to be pursued was to act as hitherto, and to lay the motion to receive upon the table. This course he had recommended on a former occasion; and he still adhered to that opinion. Mr. R. repelled the idea that this course involved a violation of the right of petitioning. It appeared to him that the petitioners would never be satisfied until they got a report in their favor. He should, therefore, move again to lay on the table, in hopes of silencing for ever this ceaseless clamor.

Mr. PRESTON wished to say a single word. Once, perhaps, there was a time when these petitions might have been received; now, however, he thought the time had passed by; it was no longer safe to receive them. It is stated that the excitement has increased. Though the doors of Congress had been thrown open, and they had been heard, yet the fire is spread wider, and is spreading wider and wider. Why so? It is said because the right of petitioning is violated; were it not for this, we are told that the excitement would have died away. But this assertion is in face of the fact that the right of petition was given and secured to the petitioners. We, the South, said at the time that the concession would lead to more concessions, and so it has proved; the fire is not put out, but is kindled worse and worse. We went as far as we could go, for the sake of peace; we gave an amnesty, we received their petitions, and they are not satisfied. Now we say "nulla vestigia retrorsum," we must now go a step further, instead of going backward, and do now, as ought to have been done then, namely, shut altogether the doors of Congress against them. Has the South no sensibilities and prejudices to be considered? Has the North only prejudices, and feelings, and conscience, to be taken into consideration, and have we none? If you consider their views, will you not rouse us? Will you not interfere with them, for fear of irritating them; and shall no such regard be paid to us?

But the period for argument with these people is past. They demand you to adopt their principles and policy. The discussion of these matters was not agreeable to him, (Mr. P.) He thought that if Congress does not protect the South, it will be obliged to protect itself. What the South wants is peace; let not this question be let in to light up the torch of discord. Mr. P. said he should not resort to discussion, but to measures, to acts, for the protection of the South. The South must be protected, and he was disposed to do it quietly if possible; but, if not, he would say, with great emphasis, "we will protect ourselves."

Mr. CUTHBERT said, as the subject had been considerably discussed, he should confine himself to the remarks which had fallen from several Senators; and he would confidently ask, whether in the history of great affairs, involving the fate or the welfare of nations, it had not been found as highly, nay, much more important, to adhere to one course, than to change it even for a better. Mr. C. thought it peculiarly so on this subject. The Senate had been calmed in this case, by the uniformity of their course, whether it was the best or not. It was no forced conclusion, but the dictate of common sense, that perseverance in the same course would quiet the country.

But there was another point, on which Mr. C. would touch with perfect calmness. Mr. C. would not now speak of his regard to the Union; the attachment of gentlemen to the Union had been fully illustrated. But what were they now told? That a certain mode of maintaining the rights of the South would overturn those rights; that a mere error, in point of order, was to destroy the rights of the South. Was this language to be held, that Southern rights rested on so frail a basis that the slightest error would overturn them? For the Union Mr. C. was not so much alarmed as others; there was a disease in the body politic, which would have its course; but the virus would work out in time. This disease had been imported from Europe, and especially from England. Mr. C. said he was astonished at the remarks of a gentleman of so sound sense and extensive information as the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Davis.)

Mr. PIERCE concurred fully with the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston,) in the opinion that no valuable end was to be attained by discussion here upon this deeply agitating subject, and he did not rise to participate in the debate, which had sprung up, as he believed, most unexpectedly to every member of the Senate. He rose merely to express the hope that the motion to lay the question of reception on the table might not be renewed. He was in favor of the reception, and that question he desired to meet distinctly, and unembarrassed by any other motion.

When petitions of this character should be received, he would be prepared to act upon them without delay: to reject the prayer of the petitions, to lay them upon the table, or give them any other direction that might be thought best calculated to silence the agitators, and tranquillize the public mind. As a member of the select committee of the other House, of which Mr. PINCKNEY of South Carolina was chairman, he had fully concurred in the sentiments of the report presented by that gentleman at the first session of the twenty-fourth Congress; and further examination and reflection had only served to confirm him in the opinions which he at that time entertained; but mad and fanatical as he regarded the schemes of the abolitionists, and deeply as he deplored the consequences of their course upon all sections of the Union, he could give no vote that might be construed into a denial of the right of petition, and thus enable them to change their position, and make up a false issue before the country.

Mr. CLAY said he would concur with the Senator from Georgia, if the Senate, by persisting in their past course, could produce the same calmness in the country which it had done among themselves. But it was much more important that the country should be quiet than the Senate. Mr. C. had asked whether the excitement had been increased, and by what causes; with the view to ascertain if any thing could be done by the Senate to allay the excitement, and render the people quiet and happy. The reply was, that the excitement was extending, and chiefly by the impression that the great republican right of petition had been assailed, which the petitioners chose to assert, by acting with those with whom they really had no sympathy. Mr. C. preferred that the two classes of petitioners should be separated, to deprive the abolitionists of the advantage of mixing their peculiar objects with other matters.

The petitions, Mr. C. said, were first to be received; but was this all? Was not this understood to imply deliberation on the question? The cold, simple act of reception, followed by an instant rejection, amounted to not receiving, and must give color to the charge that it is a substantial denial of the right of petition. It had been said that this was not a case for argument. Not a case for argument! What was it that lay at the very bottom of all our free institutions? Argument, inquiry, reasoning, consideration, deliberation. We were a reasoning people, and it was our greatest boast that we possessed reasoning powers capable of comprehending the various subjects relating to a free Government. Mr. C. thought the best course was to receive these petitions, and refer them to the Committe for the District, to act on them as they pleased; and if the country should not then be quiet, let them make a report, embodying with the argument the various facts relating to the subject, several of which Mr. C. enumerated. The consequence of this would be, that those who were described as fanatics would be separated from those who believed that the right of petition had been assailed. The Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) had stated that this course had been taken in the other House. But let it be taken by both Houses of Congress.

Mr. GRUNDY expressed his regret at the views of the Senator from Kentucky. For two years past the Senate had pursued the course of laying the questions relating to these petitions on the table. During that time there had been little or no discussion in that body; and it was the discussion in Congress that was doing more mischief on the subject than any thing else. If the coming in of the petitions was to be prevented, how could it be done? By preserving silence upon them. Every time the petitioners observed discussion in Congress, they were encouraged to proceed; but if the Senate persisted in the course to which they had sometime adhered, their hopes would be cut off. But if this course were now abandoned, they would say that the Senate had been driven to change their ground, and they would consider it as a gain on their part. And could an abler report be made on the subject by any committee than that by the select committee of which Mr. Pinckney was chairman? And had that produced any effect? Gentlemen said no: the excitement was increasing. And could the Senate produce any effect by a report? No: it would give the petitioners hope that they would finally prevail. Mr. G. would vote to receive the petitions, because he questioned whether a contrary vote might not abridge the right of petition. But he hoped that for the sake of teaching these people that this subject must not be interfered with, they would be laid on the table.

Mr. CALHOUN said he believed that the course proposed by Mr. Clay was calculated the most of all to produce an excitement. If a single step was yielded, the fanatical spirit would be reanimated with new excitement; and those, therefore, who so yielded, incurred a fearful responsibility. Mr. C. despaired, as far as the Northern part of the country was concerned, on the question of abolition. It was interwoven with the political condition of the North, in the nature and state of parties; and it would run, and must run, into their struggles for State ascendancy. It was impossible to prevent its having a control over the political parties of the North. The great mass of Northern people believed that this Southern institution was radically wrong. The result would be this: that abolition efforts would begin with the lowest grades of society, and by gross misrepresentations, but it would go upward and spread; and Mr. C. told a distinguished Senator four years ago, while discussing another subject, that the spirit of abolition would spring up in the North, and however much he, and others like him, were opposed to the doctrine, it would one day spread so as to drive him from public life, or compel him to yield to its dictates.

The Senator from Kentucky had insisted that receiving petitions implied considering, discussing, deciding upon them. But in what situation would all this put the Southern States? It would convert the halls of Congress into places for the discussion of abolition. Mr. C. did not ask how the North would be affected; his object was to keep the South united on this subject, with a susceptibility always alive. They must first preserve themselves, for this was a question involving the very existence of the whole South. Their next object was to preserve the Union; and there was no other course for them to do this but by a united and firm resistance to these encroachments; and the earlier the better, for the country was sounder to-day than it would be to-morrow, and delay would leave it to proceed from worse to worse.

Mr. C. expressed these sentiments on no sectional ground; he would prevent, by what he had suggested, the destruction of the Union. The measure proposed by Mr. CLAY, he thought, would fail of its object, and he considered the reverse mode the best.

Mr. CLAY said he looked to the whole Union, and not to any one part or section more than another. But he had no such despondencies as the Senator from South Carolina, as to the effects of the slave, or any other conceivable question, on the Union. He had no fears for the Union; but he had a desire to tranquillize every part, and give no just cause of complaint to any portion. The question was not the same as to slavery in the District and slavery in the States. But what question was that in human affairs, so weak or so strong, that it could not be approached by argument and reason? This country would, in every emergency, appeal to its enlightened judgment, and its spirit of union and harmony, and the appeal would not be unsuccessful. Mr. C. remembered that, when the public mind was sick with discussions on the late war, he had said to an illustrious man, now no more, We must stop this everlasting discussion, this endless diplomacy; let us go to work, and appeal to the valor of our countrymen to sustain us; no other alternative is left us. But he replied, in his calm and dignified way—Mr. CLAY, recollect our institutions rest on public opinion, on reasoning and argument.

Mr. CLAY had no fear for the Union; and if the Senator from South Carolina would propose a joint resolution of the two Houses, that the man who expressed a doubt in regard to its stability should be immediately called to order and stopped, it would obtain Mr. C's hearty concurrence. The Union would last, he hoped, for ever. Mr. C's object was merely to preserve the Union in its true spirit; and separate fanaticism from those who were capable of listening to reason. There would be no loss of ground by arguing; and that cause was a bad one which did not admit of reasoning upon it.

But there was another recommendation to the course which Mr. C. proposed; it would satisfy their own consciences.

Let us show our reasons, (said Mr. C.,) and then, if we fail, we shall at least have acquitted ourselves of our duty. The best course was that pursued by the Government down to two years ago, in which these petitions were often sent to the District Committee, and there allowed to sleep; or, as was sometimes done, followed by reports. Let such reports now go the North; Mr. C. knew sentiments in favor of the Union were not less ardently felt there than elsewhere.

Mr. CALHOUN said there were cases in which reasoning and argument were both absurd and cowardly. If a man should call him a rogue, should he stop to argue the point? There were things which were to be met not with reasoning, but with instant indignation. Suppose a petition were sent here to burn the manufactories of the North, would the Senator stop to reason about such a petition? Or that the property of the rich should be given to the poor; would he reason about that?

The petitions proposed abolition in the District of Columbia; but on what ground? That Congress were bound to receive petitions in all cases, to discuss and decide upon them. But if they were bound to do so in regard to the District, Mr. C. would ask the Senator if the same rule would not hold in reference to the States. Were they bound to receive petitions for abolition in the States? [Mr. C. waited for a reply.] If not, he resumed, then the right did not exist at all. The universal sentiment with the abolitionists was, that abolition in the District was the first step to abolition in the States. Every abolitionist would say so. The first step would be in the District; the next would be to destroy the trade between the States, making the slaves serfs to the soil; and then an attempt would be made to abolish slavery in the States. What, then, would be the situation of the South? Congress would then discuss their right to property guarantied to them by the Constitution; and the Southern man who would permit it thus to be drawn into discussion; sacrificed the rights of the South. Mr. C. was in favor of the Union as much as others; but unlike the Senator from Kentucky, he was not in favor of silence when he saw danger approaching. To discern and to announce it was the best way to avoid it. The North were not well informed on this subject.

Mr. CLAY remarked, in reply, that the Senator had put extreme cases. He might just as well have supposed the abolition of the christian religion, as the abolition of slavery out of the District. But did he not see that his argument went against receiving all petitions, as much as Mr. CLAY's was in favor of receiving all without distinction? The power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District was believed to exist, and Congress had determined, by their action, that it was right to receive petitions on the subject. Was that to be confounded with a case where Congress had certainly no power?

Mr. C. regretted that they could not agree. His object was to discover a healing measure; and he thought his course the truest one.

Mr. CUTHBERT replied to the argument of Mr. CLAY, that it would be the simplest method to allay this excitement, by receiving the petitions and giving them consideration, and maintained that that argument was to be deprecated, for it would cause debate, and raise up a fury of discussion. Argument (said Mr. C.) teaches what it ought to put an end to; it foments what it is intended to allay. He solemnly appealed to the Senator from Kentucky to maintain his character of peacemaker. In former situations he (Mr. Clay) had been obliged to relent the severity of his principles, and to compromise with the South. Having first been a grand disturber in his manufacturing zeal, he had been forced to become a grand pacificator; he begged him (Mr. Clay) not to depart now from the principle of pacification.

Mr. WALL having introduced the memorial, would say a few words on the subject before the question to lay on the table was put. Mr. W. then proceeded to vindicate the character of the petitioners. They were not, he observed, fanatics; they were reasonable, sensible and temperate men; and though he (Mr. W.) did not agree with them, and though he was ready to say that the prayer of the petition ought to be rejected, yet he was not prepared, as the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) to say that his constituents should come to the door, and that then it should be shut in their faces. The right of petition belonged to the people, and the duty of consideration and respectful attention to all the petitions of all citizens of every kind belonged to Congress, as a portion of the Governmen; to the people belonged the right, and to the Government appertained the duty of considering and attending to that right. The right of petition would interfere with no other rights. The South was not rendered insecure in its rights, by granting to the North the enjoyment of its common and natural rights. Mr. W. insisted that resort should be had to reason and to argument, instead of putting down the right of petition by violence and contempt. If the South seeks to stop the mouths of the North, and prevent petitions from being heard, by so doing they raise a force and arouse an energy which cannot be put down. The right of petitioning is a very different thing from the abolition question, and it is this right which is now at issue.

Mr. W. entreated the gentleman from the South not to complicate this question, so important to hem, by bringing on to the other side the question of the right of petition; by changing the issue, and setting themselves in opposition to the most sacred rights of the people.

He (Mr. W.) had no desire to touch one hair of the rights of the South; the petitioners felt the same; but they thought Congress could and ought to interfere on the question of the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

This was a question which admitted of argument, and ought to receive calm consideration. He differed with them on the question, but could not see how they could be debarred of the right of being heard by their servants and representatives, sent here expressly to do justice to all, and to maintain, not to put down, the rights of the people.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he did not rise for the purpose of entering upon a general discussion of this question. He thought it had already been amply discussed on former occasions, and that a further discussion of it at this time was to be deprecated. The subject was now fully understood by the people. He thought the debate which had taken place this day in the Senate would do much injury, and tend to revive the irritation and excitement throughout the country, which this question was so well calculated to produce.

During the session of 1835–6, he had presented a petition from a portion of the Society of Friends, requesting Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. And here, in justice to that respectable society, he must observe, that so far as he was acquainted with them in his own neighborhood, although they were decidedly opposed to slavery in the abstract, they were not abolitionists as that term was now generally understood. The Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) had then objected to the reception of this petition. Upon the question, "Shall the petition be received," the constitutional right of petition was distinctly raised. After a long, powerful, and interesting debate, in which he (Mr. B.) had exerted his best efforts to sustain this right, the petition was received by the Senate, by a vote of 36 to 10. The constitutional right of petition was thus solemnly recognised by the Senate.

After this petition had thus been received by the Senate, he (Mr. B.) had made a motion to reject the prayer of the petition. This opened a discussion upon the question, Shall slavery be abolished in the District of Columbia or not? After a long debate, it was decided in the negative: only six Senators voting against his motion.

Now it has been said that this course of proceeding had interferred with the right of petition; but with what justice? Had not these petitions been received by a solemn vote of the Senate; and had not their prayer been deliberately considered, discussed, and rejected? The right of petition had been as clearly maintained, and the subject had been as distinctly brought before the Senate, as if the petitions had been referred to a committee. In the first place, the petitions had been received; and then the Senate had decided that slavery ought not to be abolished in the District of Columbia, and that their prayer ought to be rejected.

After these solemn proceedings had taken place, were the Senate bound, whenever a new petition of a similar character was presented, again and again, on each succeeding day, to discuss and decide the right of petition?

This course would have exasperated the feelings of the people, interfered with the transaction of the business of the country, and must have resulted as it had resulted before. In this situation, the course was adopted, in the session of 1836–7, of moving to lay the question of the reception of these petitions upon the table. This was the only mode of avoiding everlasting debate. It left the former decision in favor of the right of petition in full force, and merely decided that we would not then again discuss and decide that question. This motion decided nothing whatever but that we would defer the decision of the question to a more convenient season, and would not suffer it to interfere with the transaction of the current daily business of the Senate. The motion to lay upon the table decides nothing but that the subject shall lie upon the table for that day, subject to be again called up for consideration at any future day. The motion prevailed by a majority of 31 to 15; and this has been the course ever since pursued by the Senate.

Upon reflection, (Mr. B. said,) he never had been better satisfied with the course which he had pursued on any question than that now before the Senate. He should now purposely avoid saying any thing more upon the subject. Let us enter at this moment upon a discussion of this question, and the debate will continue for weeks, and will light up a flame over the whole country. We have already solemnly discussed and decided the question. Let us now adhere to that decision firmly. He should not have risen to say a word, had it not been asserted that to vote to lay the motion of reception upon the table was inconsistent with the right of petition, a right which he had always asserted and should ever maintain.

Mr. HUBBARD here renewed the motion to lay the motion to receive the petitions on the table; which motion was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roan, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Walker, White, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs Allen, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, and Williams—20.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the memorial of L. D. Teakle, of Maryland, presenting a plan of national currency: referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. SEVIER introduced a bill to ratify and confirm certain acts of John Pope, late Governor of Arkansas: read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. FULTON introduced a bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of a treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. KING presented the petition of Wm. Slacum; which was ordered to be printed.

Several other petitions were presented; and

The Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, December 19, 1837.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also a message from the President of the United States, in obedience to a resolution of the 12th of October last in relation to the treaty with the Choctaw Indians, and the expenses incurred in relation to the same.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Numerous private petitions were presented by Messrs. McKEAN, CLAY of Alabama, NORVELL, RIVES, and others, and others removed from files, and again referred to appropriate committees.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from two companies of Missouri volunteers, commanded by Capt. David R. Atchison and Smith Crawford, claiming pay, &c.: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Also, memorial from the Legislature of Missouri, for a port of entry at the town of Independence, in that State, and for drawback of duties on goods re-exported to Mexico; also for the establishment of a land office at the town of Liberty, in Missouri: referred to Committee on Commerce. Also a memorial from the trustees of the Wisconsin University, praying the donation of a tract of land: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. Also a memorial from the heirs of De Villemont, praying confirmation of their claim to a tract of land: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. Also, a memorial from Humphrey Marshall, stating that the payment of his pension had been suspended until a certain sum of money received by him should be refunded, praying that the said pension be released: referred to the Committee on Pensions. Also, a petition from Jos. Placy, for payment of claims for advances made to Gen. Geo. Rogers Clark in his campaign against the Indians during the Revolutionary war: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SWIFT presented a memorial and certain resolutions from the Legislature of Vermont, in relation to Texas and slavery in the District of Columbia. Mr. S. said he would move that this paper be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. NORVELL of Alabama called for the reading of the document.

The SECRETARY having read the document,

Mr. KING rose and said he considered it an infamous libel and insult on the South, let it come from what quarter it would; it was a false statement in relation to the people of the South, when it charged them with disregard for the laws, and he expressed his surprise that gentlemen should present such papers which they could not but feel were untrue. If it be so deep a disgrace to receive into this Union a State tolerating slavery, how was it we have been, and still continue, together? Coming from a State, if it had been couched in proper terms, he would not have objected to lay it on the table; but the language and import were of such a nature that he should be compelled to vote against its reception. He would not have voted

Mr. SWIFT hoped he should never prove so recreant to the interest of his constituents, as to refuse the performance of his duty, especially to present resolutions coming from the Legislature of his State. The document was the result of no party effort, it was the united voice of the whole State of Vermont, and he hoped to receive no censure for rendering due obedience to instructions emanating from so high authority.

Mr. CALHOUN deemed the present moment one of the deepest importance. A great step had been taken in the progress of events. The circumstance of the morning had come upon him wholly unexpected. He had never heard that the resolutions in question had been passed by the Vermont Legislature; yet he might have anticipated as much. He had long foreseen the present state of things; and now the time had actually come, when it was to be determined whether we are longer to remain as one united and happy people, or whether this blessed Union was to be dissolved by the hand of violence. Vermont has struck a deep and dangerous blow into the vitals of our confederacy. It was a time for action, and he could not, would not, entertain the idea of rejecting or losing sight of the document before the Senate, but as he was unprepared at present to act on the subject, he would move that the memorial be laid upon the table, pledging himself not to oppose the Senator from Vermont, should he see fit to call it up hereafter; and more, would call it up himself when he had time to prepare his mind for action on the subject: determined the subject should not rest until it had received the final action of the Senate. It was his belief that the North were sound in the matter at issue, but some seemed even to prefer the prevalence of this dangerous doctrine to the preservation and continuance of the Union. His mind was unalterably fixed, and nothing should prevent him from putting his views into execution.

Mr. MORRIS thought some respect was due to the source whence these resolutions had emanated—the Legislature of Vermont—and hoped they would at least be laid on the table, and be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN had no objection to the printing, nor would he, if laid on the table, suffer it to remain there a long time.

Mr. CUTHBERT called for the reading of the fifth resolution: granted.

Mr. ALLEN said: I wish, with the consent of the Senate, to make an observation or two, explanatory of the position which I occupy upon the subject of this and all kindred petitions and memorials. In order to do this, it is necessary to state my views as to the effect of the pending motion, which is the same as that made yesterday, on the presentation of the petition to abolish slavery in this District.

This motion has, in my judgment, the effect of refusing to receive the petition; and it is for this reason only that I will now, as I did in a like case yesterday, vote against it. But it is said that such is not the effect. I will state the proposition in a form which will itself test this question. One Senator presents a petition; another Senator makes a motion that the petition be not received; a third Senator moves to lay that motion upon the table. This latter motion, if successful, puts an end to the business. Now, I ask, where is the petition? Is it in the Senate? Certainly not: because the very form of the motion that the petition be not received, is a declaration that it has not been received, and the very object of that motion is to prevent it from being received. If the petition had already been received, then the motion not to receive would be absurd, and the other motion to lay that motion on the table would effect nothing, because the sole object of this latter motion is to exclude the petition. If this be not its object, what is it? That such are the object and effect of this latter motion is evident from the fact, that if it be agreed to, the petition is then not in the Senate, and this is equally evident from the fact that the Senate cannot proceed to take any further order on the petition. It is, therefore, clear that the effect of the motion now before us is to refuse to receive the petition; and, as I am not prepared to deny the right of petition, I shall, for that reason, vote against the motion. But I do not understand the right of petition to involve consequences so extensive as those ascribed to it, yesterday, by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay.) The right of the citizen to petition, carries with it an obligation on the Senate to hear—to receive his petition, and leaves the Senate no discretion on the question of reception, if the subject matter of the petition be within the constitutional rights of the citizen, and within the constitutional competency of Congress. But when the petition has been received, then it becomes a matter of discretion with the Senate, as to what disposition shall be made of it: whether it shall be laid upon the table, referred, or otherwise disposed of. Either of these acts is an act of deliberation, of judgment, of discretion. They are acts of a deliberative body, responsible not to the individual petitioner, but to the nation and to the States for these and all other acts. The right of the citizen to petition in the cases I have supposed, is coercive upon the Senate so far as reception is in question; and then the right of the whole people, and the States acting through the Senate, commences, and the Senate, as their representative, must, in the exercise of this right, exert its own discretion over the subject of the petition; but if this coercive right of the citizen continue after the petition is received, and extend to the mode in which it shall be treated, and the disposition which shall be made of it by the Senate, then it would lose the character of a petition, and assume that of an order. If this be admitted, the Senate would no longer enjoy the faculty of deliberation, and one man coming forward, in the character of a petitioner, might compel the grant of the object he desired, and would control the entire legislation of Congress. Such would be the tendency of the principle, that the right of the petitioner extended to the manner in which his petition should be disposed of.

I, therefore, shall vote against this motion, as I did that on yesterday, because I acknowledge the right of petition, and the correlative obligation on the Senate to receive it. And then, sir, as I do not acquiesce in the prayer of the petitioner, nor admit his right to control the action of the Senate on his petition after it has been received, I will vote for a motion to lay the petition on the table. Upon this ground I stand.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky hoped that the memorial would be withdrawn by the Senator from Vermont, and to give notice that he would introduce it at a future day, when the Senate was more prepared to act.

Mr. PRESTON had no objection to the withdrawal, but wished that the document might be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SWIFT inquired if in case of withdrawal the printing would be done?

Mr. CLAY of Alabama contended that the Senator had no right to withdraw; the memorials were now in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. SWIFT expressed his willingness to withdraw, but should certainly present the memorial again. No threats from any quarter would prevent him from doing his duty to his constituents.

Mr. KING asked the Senator from Vermont to repeat his last remarks.

Mr. SWIFT complied.

Mr. KING demanded if the language had personal allusion to himself.

Mr. SWIFT had no allusion to any Senator in particular, but there had been threats relative to a dissolution of the Union.

Mr. CALHOUN. The honorable Senator must, then, allude to me. I have made frequent allusions to the dissolution of the Union. Whatever I said, I meant. I am able to defend my ground, but I make no threats toward any Senator. My feelings on this momentous subject, and my remarks, are public, not private, in their bearing.

Mr. SWIFT withdrew his memorial, and gave notice that he would introduce it again on Tuesday next.

On motion of Mr. CLAY,

Mr. EVERETT was announced as appointed to fill the vacancy on the Committee of Ways and Means, occasioned by the resignation of Mr. BRIGGS.

Mr. HAYNES rose and asked the unanimous consent of the House to submit a motion that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the reference of the President's Message; but withdrew it temporarily at the request of Mr. EVERETT, who remarked that he was not present when the journal was read, but was informed that he had been announced as appointed on the Committee of Ways and Means, to supply the place of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Fletcher) vacated some days ago. Considering what took place, Mr. E. said he could not, consistently with the friendship and the high respect he bore that gentleman, accept the appointment. And opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS of Tennessee and CUSHING.

Mr. CUSHING concluded his remarks by submitting the following amendment to the resolution:

First, Such method of keeping the public treasure, effects, and other property, as in the judgment of said committee shall most conduce to promote the welfare, and to rescue the liberties of the people, and

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, December 20, 1837.

Mr. COFFIN, member elect from the State of Ohio, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. POPE was appointed on the Committee of Ways and Means, to fill the vacancy therein.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the resolutions to refer the different subjects embraced in the President's Message to appropriate standing committees: lost

The first business in order was the motion made by Mr. SLADE, on Monday, to refer two memorials, presented by him on that day, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia to a select committee.

Mr. SLADE addressed the House at great length on the subject. He commenced by remarking that the business of the country was transacted here, by a reference of all subjects to their appropriate committees, and that matters of the most trivial nature met with no opposition to such reference. But no sooner did any member present a memorial relating in the slightest degree to a certain subject, the abolition of slavery, than it was directly attacked and placed under prohibition He said that were he to present a petition from a constituent involving the small sum of twenty dollars, even that would not be denied a reference, inasmuch as it might involve an important principle; but here were a large class of petitions, signed by hundreds of thousands, asking the action of Congress on a subject of the greatest interest, and yet they were disposed of with no ceremony at all. He then alluded to the course pursued by certain members in opposition to such petitions, and exprssed his belief that all the movements in relation to the subject had been preconcerted with the regularity of clockwork.

Mr. WISE explained that, as he had hitherto taken upon himself to oppose the reference of such petitions, he would say, once for all, that as far as his knowledge was concerned, there had been no preconcert in relation to the opposition to this subject, neither had he received any intimation from the Speaker, or any one else, as to the mode of proceeding.

Mr. DAWSON wished to ask the gentleman from Vermont if he intended to include him in the charge of preconcerting measures in opposition to the subject.

Mr. SLADE disclaimed any intention of imputing dishonorable motives to the gentlemen who had thought it their duty to adopt such a course. He would not say but that they had acted from pure and conscientious motives; but he had stated what his own impression was, and what must be the impression of all who had observed the course pursued.

Mr. S. then made the motion to refer the memorials to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill providing for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LEGARE hoped the gentleman from Vermont would allow him to make a few remarks before he proceeded further. He sincerely hoped that gentleman would consider well what he was about before he ventured on such ground, and that he would take time to consider what might be its probable consequences. He solemnly entreated him to reflect on the possible results of such a course, which involved the interests of a nation and a continent. He would warn him, not in the language of defiance, which all brave and wise men despised, but he would warn him in the language of a solemn sense of duty, that if there was "a spirit aroused in the North in relation to this subject," that spirit would encounter another spirit in the South full as stubborn. He would tell them that, when this question was forced upon the people of the South, they would be ready to take up the gauntlet. He concluded by urging on the gentleman from Vermont to ponder well on his course before he ventured to proceed.

Mr. SLADE again resumed his remarks; and aftar proceeding for some time, he entered into an argument touching the subject of slavery in the State of Virginia, and was about to read a paper on the same subject, whereupon

Mr. WISE interposed, and said that the gentleman had been discussing slavery in the South, slavery in the State of Virginia, slavery in his district; and he now asked his colleagues to retire with him from that hall.

Mr. HOLSEY made the same request to his colleagues from Georgia, and expressed a hope that the whole southern delegation would retire.

Mr. GRANTLAND also joined in the same wish.

Mr. RHETT. The whole of the delegation of South Carolina has already signed an agreement.

Mr. ROBERTSON. One remark, Mr. Speaker.

Mr SLADE. I claim the floor.

The CHAIR. Does the gentleman from Virginia rise to a question of order?

Mr. ROBERTSON. No, sir. I wish to make one observation.

Mr. RHETT. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I wish simply to propose to the Southern delegation—

Mr. RHETT. I rise to a point of order. The question of order is, whether the member from Vermont has a right to go into the consideration of slavery in the State of Virginia? I say he has not; and if it is insisted upon, I request the whole Southern delegation to go into the room of the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The CHAIR reminded the House that he had repeatedly interposed when the gentleman from Vermont had been going into the question of slavery in the States. He was not permitted to give his own opinions, but they might readiiy be inferred by the House. He felt it his duty to state, that if it were possibly in his power to allay excitement, and to prevent discussions of this sort, he would do it.

Mr. TURNEY rose, he said, to a question of order.

Mr. SLADE. I ask leave to read a paper, and to state what that paper is.

Mr. GRANTLAND. I object to the reading of it.

The CHAIR. The gentleman will take his seat.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland. Will it be in order, Mr. Speaker, to take the sense of the House whether the member from Vermont shall be permitted to proceed?

The CHAIR replied negatively.

Mr. McKAY. Mr. Speaker, has not the member from Vermont been declared out of order?

The CHAIR. He has.

Mr. McKAY. Then has he a right to proceed?

The CHAIR. No gentleman has raised that question.

Mr. McKAY. Then, sir, I make that question. I object to his proceeding. I object to his resuming his remarks, and I hope the House will not permit him.

The CHAIR then, under the rule, directed Mr. SLADE to take his seat, and pronounced the gentleman out of order for discussing the question of slavery in the State of Virginia. Referring to the 22d rule, the CHAIR added that the gentleman could no longer proceed without the leave of the House; and he was about to propound the question, when

Mr. SLADE said he wished to state the position in which he stood. I propose, said he, to read a single paper——

Mr. TURNEY. I object to the gentleman's proceeding at all.

The CHAIR said the rule was imperative. The gentleman could not proceed, under the question made by Mr. McKAY, without leave of the House.

Mr. SLADE. The question now is, whether it is in order for me to ask for the reading of a paper.

The CHAIR. The other question is also before the House, and must be decided by its vote, without debate.

Mr. SLADE. I ask if I am out of order while proceeding with the leave of the House, going on for at least twenty minutes, and then merely asking leave to read a paper.

The CHAIR states that his power to commence was when the question of order was made. Thereafter, the rule was imperative, directing its decision without debate.

Mr. SLADE, (who was still on his feet) Mr. Speaker—

The CHAIR. The gentleman will take his seat.

Mr. SLADE then pledged himself, if the House would permit him to resume, not to discuss the question of slavery in the States.

The CHAIR then propounded the question to the House that the gentleman from Vermont have leave to proceed.

Mr. ALLEN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. RENCHER moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. SLADE asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 106, nays 63.

Mr. CAMPBELL then gave notice that the southern delegations were then assembled in the room of the Committee for the District of Columbia; and he said he was instructed by their committee to request the attendance of all gentlemen representing slaveholding interests on that floor immediately.

The House then adjourned.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill to restrain the issuing of small notes in the District of Columbia was then taken up.

Mr. WRIGHT explained the object of this bill, and suggested that thirty days would be an appropriate period to fill the blank.

Mr. CLAY said that no one more ardently desired the resumption of specie payments than himself; but he doubted the expediency of forcing the banks of this District to resume at a period of uncertainty as to when those of the surrounding country should adopt such a measure. He had that morning received news from New York of the resumption of another of their banks, and that, taken in connection with information derived of late from various quarters, inspired him with much stronger hopes than he had formerly entertained, that the banks would, at an early day, return to specie payments throughout the country. With regard to the banks of this District, it was futile to suppose that they could attempt to pay specie, when those with whom they were so intimately connected did not do so. He thought the wisest, as well as the most prudent step, would be to postpone the matter to an early period in January—say first or second week—when there might be a similar movement on the part of the Baltimore and Richmond banks. Congress could then with more certainty fix the time when these banks must resume, or have their charters revoked. He thought it wrong for Congress to legislate too hastily for a people under its immediate charge, without reference to the position in which they stood to their neighboring population. As the holydays were approaching, (a period when Congress was not presumed to be subject to any very grave legislation,) he thought the banks might be longer indulged, and he hoped, therefore, there would be little or no opposition to his suggestion.

Mr. WRIGHT remarked, that the District banks were never authorized by their charters to issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars. Now, however, it had become their habit, in common with individuals, to issue notes from twenty-five to six and a fourth cents. "Shin-plasters" (a distinguishing term, and one he disliked as much as any one else) had been necessarily used for change, because the people had in a measure been forced to do so, by the suspension of these banks; but this small money business he believed was carried to a greater extent in this district than in any other portion of our country. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, in his remarks, threw out the idea that the banks of this District were dependent on their relative position with those in Maryland and Virginia for resumption! Suppose the case was reversed, and the Legislatures of those States depended on the action of Congress to force the banks of this District to resume, under forfeiture of their charters: at what future period should we look for so desirable a result. Mr. W. had reviewed this subject in his own mind, in every light, and had come to the conclusion that the banks here should resume on the 1st of May next, or be made to suspend operations altogether. He could see no reason why it should be longer deferred. Should the action of Congress be postponed to a future day, when the period fixed by law should arrive, the banks might ask: Why was it postponed? Here we have only some thirty or forty days' notice given us; whereas, had the law passed at a proper time, we should have been prepared.

Mr. CLAY said he could see no good reason why Congress should not extend a corresponding courtesy to the District banks, with that of the Legislatures of the several States to their moneyed institutions. Would it not be better to postpone the day to a later period, when the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland would be in session, and an opportunity afforded of witnessing the action of those bodies on the matter?

With regard to these small bills, if immediately suppressed, what was to be done? There was no silver to supply the vacuum; and members of Congress had found this small money very convenient on many occasions. Hackmen, waiters and others could not be dispensed with; and without this kind of change, how could their services be requited? Another objectionable feature in the bill was, that it imposed a penalty alike on the stranger and citizen, for the passage of these bills, whether issued here, or brought from abroad. He had in his purse notes from one dollar down to six cents, originating in the different places through which he had passed from Newport, Kentucky, to Washington city, in the District of Columbia; in fact, business could not progress without them. And would it not be a legal imposition on a stranger to pass this bill with such provisions? Could it be expected that a stranger passing through this small space of ten miles square, could stop to inquire into our laws? nor would a traveller once suspect the danger in offering a note, the issue of a neighboring State, in change, of being pursued by a constable, and arrested on a writ.

If the chairman of the Committee on Finance could only throw into the District a sufficient supply of silver change, he (Mr. C.) would go with him hand and heart in the annihilation of these substitutes; but it was rather hard, after the experiment had deprived us of our substantial currency, that we should be deprived also of the only substitute. Mr. C. thought great caution was necessary in pursuing this subject, and he hoped it would be postponed until the second week in January, and made a motion to that effect.

Mr. BENTON objected to the postponement. The argument was to postpone both bills,—the shin plaster bill, and the bank bill,—and that not to a certain day, but indefinitely, and until adjoining States should first act upon the same subjects. This was the argument of the Senator from Kentucky. (Mr. Clay.) His motion was for a postponement until the second Monday in January, but the argument was for indefinite postponement, and for contingent action; and it was evident, from the two speeches just made by that Senator, (Mr. Clay,) that if the postponement was granted, that another would be demanded when it was out; for the whole tenor of his two speeches was, that the shin-plasters were not to be suppressed, nor the bank in this District required to resume, until the adjacent States had first led the way in the same work. This was indefinite postponement, and contingent action. It was the attempt to do here precisely what had been effected by the party opposed to resumption in the bank convention in New York; it was non-action! it was to do nothing! and get rid of the subject without fixing a day!

Mr. B. denied that there was any validity in any of the reasons given by the Senator from Kentucky for delaying either of the bills. There was no necessity for these filthy shin-plasters. The Senators alone received for their compensation more hard money than the District required for change. They had received all their pay in gold and silver at the called session, and they were now receiving their pay in hard money and Treasury notes, in the proportion of two-thirds hard money and one-third Treasury notes. This is the manner in which the Senate is paid, its officers and all, and all its expenses. He presumed the House of Representatives was paid in the same way; and as the expenses of the two Houses exceeded three thousand dollars a day, it would follow that upwards of two thousand a day in specie was receivable by the members and officers of Congress. This was the daily supply; so that, leaving all other sources of supply out of the question, Congress alone disbursed vastly more hard money in the District than its business could absorb, and it was accordingly purchased up for exportation by agents whose advertisements could be seen in every newspaper.

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) has declared that members of Congress cannot get change without taking these shin-plasters; that all are obliged to take them; that he has to take them himself; and he has even made profert of a bundle of them here in the Senate, by way of giving emphasis to his asseveration. But it is a mistake. No member of Congress is obliged either to give or to take shin-plasters. The two-thirds of his pay which he gets in hard money will pay all his current expenses; and as for change, he will always get the kind he gives. If he pays out shin-plasters, he will get the same in change; if he pays out hard money, he will get hard money in change. This was the invariable practice. Every body knew it. It was seen every hour of the day. Two persons making payment at the same time, and to the same person, one paying in hard money, the other in shin-plasters, receive their change, in the presence of each other, in the same medium which they use. The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) had said people could not travel except upon these shin-plasters. The experience of himself (Mr. B.) authorized him to gainsay this assertion. He (Mr. B.) had travelled six thousand miles this summer, and no one had ever offered him shin-plasters or broken bank notes. The reason was, that he offered such trash to nobody, and nobody offered it to him. Every where that he had travelled, as well as in this District, he received hard money change, and that without asking for it, it being a matter of course, wherever he had travelled or sojourned, to give the change in the same kind of money in which the payment was made. Upon this statement of facts, Mr. B. would abide the decision of the Senate, and of the community, upon the issue which he had joined with the Senator from Kentucky, namely, that there was no necessity for postponing the shin-plaster bill.

Mr. B. adverted to the other bill—the one to compel the district banks to resume payment by the first of May—and declared all the reasons given by the Senator from Kentucky, in favor of delaying that bill to be invalid and insufficient. One of those reasons was, that the banks of the District could not resume until their neighbors did—that there must be a general resumption, or the resuming banks would be destroyed. Mr. B. knew this to be the common argument with all those who were for delaying the resumption, and if it prevailed, there would be no resumption at all, as many banks were either unable or unwilling to resume, and would never agree to any time that could be named. The Finance Committee had looked to this contingency, and had framed their bill on a new principle—on a principle which would enable the banks of any State, District, or Territory, to resume when the legislative authority pleased, and that with perfect safety to themselves, although no other bank in the country, or in the world, should resume. The principle was to illegalize the circulation of any non-specie paying bank paper from the day of the resumption, and to make the passers of it liable for it as its issuers, with a right of summary recovery against them. Here is the section:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, it shall be unlawful for any person, company, or corporation, within the District of Columbia, to pass, or offer to pass, any bank note, or paper currency, issued by any bank, banker, or company, not redeeming its notes and currency on demand in gold and silver; and every person offending against this act shall be subject to a fine of one hundred dollars for each offence, and, moreover, shall be deemed and held to be the maker and issuer of such note or currency, and shall be liable to pay the amount thereof, on demand, to any holder thereof, with all costs incident to the protest and legal collection thereof, with fifty per centum damages for non-payment on demand, to be recovered by motion, on notice given, or process served, summarily and without delay, and with a right of immediate discovery on oath in all cases where the defendant shall deny the passing or attempting to pass the notes, or currency, in question; and in case of judgment for the plaintiff, execution shall be had thereon forthwith. And it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the District of Columbia to commence prosecutions for the recovery of the penalty incurred, against all persons and every corporation offending against this section, of which he shall have knowledge or probable information; and in case of corporations, the prosecution shall be against the president, or any director or cashier thereof, for the time being."

By this section, continued Mr. B. the banks of this District will be perfectly safe in resuming on the 1st of May next, although no other banks in the country, or in the world, shall resume at that time; for the notes of no non-specie paying bank can come into competition with them. All such are excluded from the District—banished—outlawed; and if any person shall bring any such into the District, he, and every successive passer of it, is made in law what he is in fact, the issuer of it within the District, and is made liable for its contents, with summary proceedings for the recovery. Under this section, either no such notes will be brought into the District, or if they are, the passers of them, each in his turn, will be liable for their contents; and so it will cease to be uncovertible, and will be payable at the will of the holder. This does away all reason for waiting for a general resumption, and sets an example, which being followed by the States, each for itself, will enable each one to resume when its Legislature pleases.

Mr. B. gave an additional reason for speedy resumption: it was the state of the foreign exchanges, now three per cent. on the specie standard, in favor of the United States. The non-resumption party in the bank convention in New York were enabled to succeed in preventing the fixing of a day for resuming, solely by an objection to the foreign exchanges, then against us. This we learn from Mr. Johnson's speech. Since that time these exchanges have become decidedly in our favor. There is then a total removal, at this time, of the ground which the non-resumption party then stood upon; and if this change had taken place one hour before the convention adjourned, one of three results must have been produced, viz: either the non-resuming party must have agreed to fix a day for a general resumption; or, invented some other pretext for not agreeing; or, openly taken ground in favor of indefinite suspension; and so established their title to the appellation of the Universal Broken Bank and Shin-plaster party.

Mr. B. said the country was now cursed with a pestiferous circulation of irredeemable bank notes and shin-plasters; and this curse, by a large political party, was charged upon General Jackson and his friends; but he believed that events were impending which would enlighten the public mind on that point, and show to the country who were for, and who were against, a broken bank and a shin-plaster currency. The events in the New York bank convention, and the votes—not the speeches, but the votes—which would soon take place in Congress, and in the State Legislatures, would develope the true position of each political party, and would make each known, not by its words, but by its works. By that test he was willing to abide, and should await its decision.

Mr. B. said that General Jackson and his friends had been the subjects of many attempts at wit, for what was called their experiments on the currency, and he presumed that many had repeated that phrase, without precisely knowing what those experiments were. To all such he had a little information to give; and that was, to show them what these experiments were, what success has attended them, and what it is that the opposers of these experiments have been, and now are, opposing. This was easily done, for they were compressed into three resolutions, which he (Mr. B.) had the honor, some years since, to draw up, and to submit to the Senate. They were:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report to the Senate and to the House respectively, what alterations, if any, are necessary to be made:

"1. In the value of the gold coined at the mint of the United States, so as to check the exportation of that coin and to restore it to circulation in the United States.

"2. In the laws relative to foreign coins, so as to restore the gold and silver coin of foreign nations to their former circulation within the United States.

"3. In the joint resolution of 1816, (for the better collection of the revenues,) so as to exclude all bank notes under twenty dollars from revenue payments after a given period, and to make the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country."

These were the experiments, first to correct the gold standard; secondly, to restore foreign coins to circulation; thirdly, to effect the gradual suppresion of paper currency under twenty dollars. These were the objects; but, before we see what success has attended our exertions to accomplish them, let us see what was the actual state of the currency at that time, to wit: at the veto session of 1832. It was this: Of gold, there was not a single piece in circulation; of silver there was, according to the estimate of a Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) speaking on data furnished by the Bank of the United States, "from twenty to twenty-two millions of dollars;" and of bank notes there was a general deluge of the smallest denominations, down to one dollar. This was the state of the currency in 1832, when General Jackson and his friends undertook to improve its condition. Now for the result of their labors. Of gold, the circulation had been created, from nothing, to twelve or fifteen millions of dollars, and the standard adopted by us has been found to be so precisely accurate that the premium on American gold and American silver is now exactly the same! Our silver has been increased till it amounts, with the gold, to upwards of eighty millions of dollars; and the small note circulation under twenty dollars was in a course of gradual suppression in every State in which the political friends of General Jackson were in the majority. This was the state of the experiment in May last, when all the banks in the Union suddenly closed their vaults, and have remained closed ever since. They all closed, though all could not have desired to do so; and which did not, and which did, will be as distinctly seen in the division on the impending question of resumption, as if it had been openly declared at the time the banks shut up.

To show the merit of the reform in the currency effected by General Jackson and his friends, Mr. B. had recourse to another test, that of the exports and imports of specie; and he read a table which he had obtained from the Treasury Department. Is only went back to the year 1821, which was the earliest date that could be obtained; and from that time until 1832, the year of the veto on the United States Bank charter, the results stood thus:

	Imports.	Exports.
1821	$8,064,890	$10,478,059

1822	3,369,846	10,810,189
1823	5,097,896	6,372,987
1824	8,379,835	7,014,553
1825	6,150,765	8,797,055
1826	6,880,960	4,704,553
1827	8,152,130	8,014,880
1828	7,489,741	8,243,476
1829	7,403,612	4,924,020
1830	8,155,964	2,178,773
1831	7,305,945	9,014,931
1832	5,907,504	5,656,340

This presents a period of twelve years of imports and exports; and these twelve years cover that precise portion of the existence of the Bank of the United States which is celebrated by its friends as the ne plus ultra of perfection; and what was the result? Why, that our exports of specie exceeded our imports; that our exports amounted to the enormous sum of $85,280,368, while our imports amounted to $83,356,662, and that the effect of this excessive exportation was to leave the country with no more than twenty or twenty-two millions of specie to sustain all its banking, and all its commercial operations!

In the year 1832, the year of the veto message, General Jackson and his friends first commenced their efforts to improve the currency; and the result is shown in this table:

	Imports.	Exports.
1834	17,911,632	1,676,258
1835	13,131,447	5,748,174
1836	12,166,372	4,435,815
1837	10,954,432	6,714,990

Behold the difference, said Mr. B. Here in the short space of five years, we have an import of upwards of sixty-two millions; an export of almost nothing. Making an allowance for the gold coined at the mint, the specie brought in by passengers, and not registered at the custom-houses, and the actual increase of specie for the last five years, averages twelve millions per annum; and this great increase has been the salvation of the country, and enabled it to ride out the storm of the present bank suspension, and to triumph over it; for complete and proud will be the triumph of the country over the diabolical design to impose upon it a broken bank paper, and shin-plaster currency! If there had been no more specie in the country in May last, than there was at the time of the veto message in 1832, the country would have been crushed! but eighty millions, instead of twenty, has saved the country; and shown that it is able to stand the shock of a universal suspension of specie payments by the baks. Such is the strength of General Jackson's policy—so wisely is it founded in correct principles, that even in this year of bank suspensions, and in defiance of all attempts to drive specie from the country, there has been an importation of near eleven millions, and an export of only six millions and three quarters; and we are now ready to begin another year, with the double advantage of the foreign exchanges in our favor, and the whole of the last year's crop just ready to go to market. The imports of specie for this year must then be immense, probably as great as they were the year after the panic, when they amounted to near eighteen millions reported at the customs, besides several millions brought by emigrants, and not reported. Such is the fruit of General Jackson's policy; and if that policy can be continued a few years longer, our stock of gold and silver will continue to increase until every part of the Union, like Holland and France, is saturated with the precious metals, and until the most undaunted advocate for shin-plasters and broken bank notes will be forced to admit that there is no necessity for such vile and filthy substitutes for specie.

Mr. B. contrasted the five years' result of General Jackson's experiment with the preceding twelve years' regulation of the currency by the Bank of the United States. The difference was, a LOSS of two millions of specie in the twelve years of bank, and A GAIN of sixty millions in the five years of of General Jackson's experiment. This was the difference; and this difference shows, that if the experiment had only began a few years sooner, we should now have had as much gold and silver as the business of the whole Union could possibly employ; and if it can now be continued a few years longer, we shall soon have as much as can possibly be used. Look at the imports! they are always large. They are the natural effect of the exportation of our annual crop of one hundred millions' worth of cotton, tobacco, rice, and other articles. These have brought, are bringing, and will continue to bring, annually, eight, ten, fifteen, eighteen millions of dollars, to say nothing of what is brought by emigrants. If the experiment continues, the mass of these annual imports will remain in the country until the country is saturated with specie; then the surplus will overflow of itself. But if the enemies of the experiment succeed, and especially if they succeed in changing the experiments, then the old policy of the Bank of the United States will prevail. Exportation of specie will be the order of the day! The States will again be drained of forty-two millions, as they were from 1817 to 1832. The whole will go to England. Exports will be made to exceed imports; and at the end of some years we shall be brought back to that vaunted period of 1832, with from "twenty to twenty-two millions of specie;" and the whole business of the country—crops, commerce, exchanges, real and personal property, stocks, and every Government, State and Federal—the prey of the Bank of the United States.

Having shown that the specie in the country was increased from 1832 to 1837, from twenty millions to eighty millions, Mr. B. wished the friends of the non-resumption banks to reconcile an apparent contradiction. It was this: that with only twenty millions of specie in 1832, they held the currency to be soundest, safest, and finest upon earth! and now, with eighty millions of specie in the country, they hold the country to be utterly ruined, and totally unable to raise vicayunes and ninepences to carry to the post office, or to the market! This was a contradiction which he wished to see reconciled; and until it was reconciled, he must be permitted to believe that, as eighty millions is four times greater than twenty-millions, so is the country this day four times more able to pay specie in 1837 than it was in 1832.

Mr. B. besought gentlemen not to be distressed at the thoughts of parting company with their dear shin plasters. It was quite possible to live without them, and to live well. He had experience on this subject. There were no shin-plasters in Missouri, and there was no distress or misery there. All was flourishing and happy; real estate, personal estate, produce, labor, all bearing the highest prices ever known before, and hard money in every man's pocket. He had a letter from one of the principal mechanics of St. Louis, in answer to an inquiry made of him, which stated the prices of labor in St. Louis, and which with the leave of the Senate he would read. The letter was as follows:

"ST. LOUIS, Nov. 20, 1837.

"SIR: After my best respects to yourself and family, in compliance with a wish expressed by you to me a few days before you left this city for Washington, I write to give you a statement of the wages given to mechanics and laborers in this city and adjoining districts, which are as follows: For house carpenters, two dollars per day; for boat builders or ship carpenters, two dollars and fifty cents per day; bricklayers, three dollars per day; stonemasons, two dollars and fifty cents per day; stonecutters, three dollars per day; plasterers, two dollars and fifty cents to three dollars per day; painters, two dollars per day; blacksmiths, two dollars per day; cabinet makers, piece work, fifteen dollars per week; saddlers, piece work, say from fifteen to eighteen dollars per week; tailors, piece work, say from twelve to twenty dollars per week; quarrymen, one dollar and fifty cents per day, and the superintendent or foreman of a quarry, two dollars per day; laboring hands, digging cellars and working in the streets, one dollar and twenty-five cents to one dollar and fifty cents per day; laboring men to work on a farm, twenty dollars per month, and found.

"Respectfully, your sincere friend,

——— ———.

"HON. THOMAS H. BENTON."

Such are the prices of labor in St. Louis,—such the rewards of labor in that place;—and this only gives one view of the state of things in that city. Its commerce was still more striking; and certain he was that he saw more commerce in the port, and on the wharf of St. Louis, the day he left there, than he had seen from that place to Washington city, including all that he saw in all the cities, towns and villages on the Ohio river put together. And that without banks; for the one chartered last winter was more in name than in substance, and issued no notes except for specie deposited, dollar for dollar. Mr. B. expressed his belief that St. Louis, in point of arriving and departing tonnage, was now the third city of the Union; that New York was first, New Orleans second, and St. Louis third; and that she had attained this eminence without banks and without shin-plasters, and was advancing at this moment with a degree of rapidity, and enjoying at this moment, a degree of CREDIT, prosperity, and happiness which nobank-ridden or shin-plastered city in America can boast of.

Mr. B. said the policy of General Jackson would succeed. It was right in itself, and would succeed. It might be frustrated temporarily by a combination of banks, and was now frustrated by them; but there were good banks and bad banks in the country, and a division would take place among them; and in that division every bank and every political party will take its own station. Gold and silver, now four times more abundant in the United States than they were five years ago, will continue to increase; the public determination to have them will increase just in the proportion to the efforts to deprive the country of them; detestation of shin-plasters and broken bank notes will increase in proportion to the efforts to continue them in circulation; and, eventually, the day of recoil, of revulsion, must come. Shin-plasters will be put down, no matter who defends them; broken bank notes will be put down, no matter who cherishes them; banks will have to resume or die, no matter who opposes the resumption; gold will come into circulation, no matter who hates gold; hard money will be the common currency of the country, no matter who wishes the contrary; a pestiferous issue of small bank notes under twenty dollars, will be suppressed, no matter who is for small notes; banks will be made responsible for their debts, no matter who is for irresponsibility. These things will come to pass, not because this or that man says so, but because they are right in themselves; and what is right in itself will eventually succeed in every moral and intelligent community. Yes! "the experiment" has increased our specie, in five years, from twenty millions to eighty millions; it is now increasing it at the rate of many millions per annum; it will continue to increase until the whole country is filled with gold and silver, until the quantity is so great that resistance can no longer be made to its circulation; and then broken bank paper, shin-plasters, and all their friends and supporters, will sink together. These things will happen; they will come to pass, but not without contest and arduous struggling. Great will be the effort to keep up the broken bank and shin-plaster system—an effort doubly directed to force the circulation of this trash, and to resist all measures to restore the constitutional currency. We see this circulation forced and pushed every where; we see all attempts to check it universally and systematically opposed. In the New York Convention of banks, in the Congress of the United States, in the State Legislatures, it is all the same thing, and by the same party. Opposition! opposition! opposition! to all the measures proposed for the resumption of specie payments, and no proposition of any measure in place of those opposed, to coerce the resumption. This opposition is made by the Bank of the United States and its friends. That institution and its friends now stand as the SOLE OBSTACLES to the resumption of specie payments. They struggle against the public good, and against the swelling tide of public opinion. But this unnatural struggle will cease; it will cease under the accumulated massess of gold and silver which "the experiment" has brought, is bringing, and will continue to bring, into this bank-ridden and shin-plastered nation.

Mr. NILES then rose and addressed the Senate for more than an hour in opposition to the postponement. He had no disposition to oppress the banks of this District; but he thought they, in common with others, had forfeited their claims to public favor. He was in favor of an early action by Congress, on account of the moral effect it would have in setting a good example to the States.

[As soon as this speech can be written from the Reporter's notes it will be given.]

Mr. TIPTON said that he would vote for the motion of the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) to postpone the consideration of the bill now before the Senate to the second Monday of January next, to afford time for us to hear from the Legislatures of the States now in session. He was opposed to the issue and circulation of the small bills or notes, familiarly called "shin-plasters," and would go for freeing the people of the District of Columbia from that species of trash. He also felt it to be his duty, so far as his vote would go, to compel the banks of the District to resume specie payments at the time we exclude shin-plasters from circulation here; but he would not now give a vote to coerce the banks of this District to pay specie at an earlier day than that at which the banks of the different States should resume specie payments. It had been indicated from different quarters, that the first of May was the time that would possibly be fixed on by all solvent banks to resume specie payments. He hoped and believed that the bank of his own State would not wish to put off specie payments to a later day. The Legislature of Indiana was now in session, and would certainly not adjourn without taking steps to produce a result so desirable to every one. It was due to the reputation of the States, as well as to the note holders and to public justice, that all such banks should be compelled, if compulsion was necessary, to resume at a day not more distant than the first of May. So far as the bank of Indiana was concerned, no one need doubt her inclination, as well as her ability, to resume at an early day.

Mr. T. said, while on the subject of banks and paper currency, he would take occasion to say that he was in favor of a mixed currency—paper, bottomed on a metallic basis, convertible at the pleasure of the holder into gold and silver. On such a currency the State which he had in part the honor to represent here had grown to its present important standing among her sister States. She had established a bank, which had been ably conducted, and was, beyond doubt, in a wholesome condition, both able and willing to resume specie payments at any time. He was anxious to see all banks resume specie payments: let those, if any there be, that are not able to resume, be known. He had no doubt that the banks of this District were ready to resume; and he thought the first of May a suitable time to force these small bills out of existence, and let metal take their places to furnish change to the people of the District. He could not doubt the ability of the District banks to supply gold and silver for change for the people of this vicinity.

Mr. WRIGHT said he felt himself bound to call for the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone; when there appeared for the postponement, 15; against it, 26.

Mr. SEVIER, having mistaken the question, afterwards recorded his vote against it; so that the vote stood as follows, 14 to 27.

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Knight, McKean, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, and Tipton—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Conn. Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright and Young—27.

The bill under went a long discussion in relation to its details, in which Messrs. WRIGHT, BENTON, HUBBARD, and GRUNDY participated.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the blank in the third line was filled with the 10th of April, so as to make it penal to issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars, after that date.

Mr. YOUNG moved an amendment which after being discussed, was adopted, and reads as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful for any individual, company, or corporation, to issue de novo, or knowingly to pass, or procure to be issued, passed, or circulated, within the District aforesaid, any note, check, bank bill, or other paper medium, evidently intended for common circulation, as for, and in lieu of, small change in gold and silver, or for any other purpose whatever, and which shall be issued or circulated for the first time, after the period above limited in this section, under the penalties prescribed in the foregoing act.

Amendments offered by Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, and other were debated until a late hour, when the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, Dec. 21, 1837.

Mr. SLADE moved a correction of the journal in relation to the record of the question of order of yesterday, but it was not agreed to.

Mr. PATTON then asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, and papers, touching the abolition of slavery, or the buying, selling, or transferring of slaves, in any State, District, or Territory, of the United States, be laid on the table, without being debated, printed, read, or referred, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

Mr. ADAMS objected.

Mr. PATTON moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. CUSHMAN asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 135, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson Bruyn, Buchanan, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Timothy J. Carter, William B. So the rules were suspended.

Mr. PATTON said he had offered this resolution in the spirit of peace and harmony. It involves, (said Mr. P.) so far as I am concerned, and so far as concerns some portion of the representatives of the slave holding States, a concession; a concession which we make for the sake of peace, harmony, and union. We offer it in the hope that it may allay, not exasperate excitement; we desire to extinguish, not to kindle a flame in the country In that spirit, sir, without saying one word in the way of discussion; without giving utterance to any of those emotions which swell in my bosom at the recollection of what took place here yesterday, I shall do what I have never yet done since I have been a member of this House, and which I have very rarely sustained, when done by others: I move the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS rose and said: Mr. Speaker, the gentleman precedes his resolution—(Loud cries of "Order! order!" from all parts of the hall.) Mr. A. He preceded it with remarks—("Order! order!")

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that it was out of order to address the House after the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask the House—(continued cries of "Order!" which completely drowned the honorable member's voice.)

Mr. ADAMS then demanded tellers on the second to the previous question, which were ordered; and Mr. CLAIBORNE of Mississippi, and Mr. BRIGGS of Massachusetts, having been appointed, the motion prevailed, 124 voting for it.

So the demand for the previous question was seconded by the House.

On the question; "Shall the main question be now put?" being propounded—

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 129, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bruyn, Buchanan, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, W. B. Campbell, T. J. Carter, William B. [When the name of Mr. ADAMS was called, that gentlemen rose, and said: "I hold the resolution to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States." [Loud cries of "Order!" "order!" from every part of the Hall.]

The SPEAKER said, the gentleman from Massachusetts violates order, and must resume his seat.

Pending the question being propounded,

Mr. DUNCAN inquired of the Chair if he could assign the reasons for the vote he should give.

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. WISE (who had not voted) inquired of the Chair the rule in relation to a member being excused from voting, and at what stage the reasons for making such a request must be made.

The CHAIR said before a division of the House, or before the commencement of the call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE said, as he could not assign his reasons at length, he desired, at least, that his constituents might know that he was present. He could not vote for the resolution, because it implied or admitted a principle he denied—the right to receive those petitions.

After the vote was taken,

Mr. ADAMS rose, and moved that his reason for not voting on the resolution be entered on the journal.

The CHAIR said it was out of order.

Mr. ADAMS then notified his request to the Clerk to make an entry of his motion, and that it was pronounced by the Chair to be out of order.]

REFERENCE OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. ADAMS in the chair, on the resolutions to refer the different subjects embraced in the President's Message to appropriate standing committees.

The question pending was the following resolution, as modified, submitted by Mr. HAYNES:

3. Resolved, That so much of said Message as relates to the finances, and every thing connected therewith; to the safe-keeping of the public moneys, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

And the amendment moved thereto by Mr. CUSHING, as follows:

Whereas the influence of the Executive department of the Federal Government has, for some time past, in derogation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, continued to increase, and ought to be diminished:

Resolved, therefore, That in order to correct the said abuse, so much of the President's Message as relates to the collection, safe-keeping, and transfer of the public money be referred to with instructions to report—

First, such method of keeping the public treasure, effects, and other property, as in the judgment of said committee shall most conduce to promote the welfare and to secure the liberties of the people; and,

Secondly, such other reforms in the practices of the Government as in their opinion shall tend to bring back the administration thereof to the standard of the original purity of the Constitution.

After some explanatory remarks from Mr. CUSHING,

Mr. EWING wished to make a few observations in relation to what had been said the other day by the gentleman from Cincinnati, (Mr. Duncan.) He contended that Mr. D. had evaded the questions propounded, by offering him a prescription, and calling upon him to define what Federalism was. He certainly felt much affected by the kindness of that gentleman, but he begged to tell him that, when he wanted medicine, he would employ a regular physician. He considered the prescriptions hitherto prepared by the Committee of Ways and Means, as inadequate to effect a cure of the present evils, and concluded his remarks by giving Mr. D. some advice as to the course of reading he ought to pursue in order to obtain a just idea of the true state of the country.

Mr. DUNCAN was much amused at the speech just made by the gentleman from Indiana, and his learned disquisition on medicine. The last time he had administered a cathartic to the gentleman, but as that did not appear to produce the effect intended, he would, on the next occasion, administer an anodyne.

Mr. UNDERWOOD should make but a few observations. He considered it an undeniable fact that all the present difficulties of the country were attributable to the organic construction of the Government, the continual tendency of which was to concentrate power in the hands of the Executive. In his opinion the only remedy was so to amend the Constitution as to prevent that tendency, and at some future time he would take occasion to offer resolutions to that effect. Mr. U. then referred to the various Executive departments, in which he said there was much which called for the attention of the House. He adverted at some length to the "Exploring Expedition;" to the Florida war, and to the alledged grievances in the Post Office Department, which he charged with great neglect in the transportation of papers sent by members to their constituents. He complained that the President was giving them lectures on the New York elections, instead of suggesting measures of reform. He then expressed his views in reference to the establishment of a National Bank, which he contended was the only means of regulating and producing a uniform currency, and on that ground was opposed to the reference of the subject to the Committee of Ways and Means, as that Committee had at the late special session reported a resolution adverse to the establishment of such an institution.

Mr. MALLORY addressed the committee on the subject of a resolution heretofore offered by him, calling for information respecting the delay of the sailing of the South Sea Exploring Expedition. He gave a statement of the appropriations made at various times for that object, and charged the Secretary of the Navy with gross mismanagement in relation to it. He also took a general view of the navy, and maintained that its condition was such as imperatively demanded an investigation.

Without taking the question, on motion of Mr. GRANT, the committee rose.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message of the President of the United States, in relation to the construction of the new Treasury building, &c.; which, on motion of Mr. LINCOLN, was referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to insolvent debtors; which, on motion of Mr. McKIM, was laid on the table.

Several bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, five thousand copies of the designs to the report in relation to the establishment of marine hospitals on the western waters, was ordered to be lithographed for the use of the House.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKEN,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the present state of the currency within said District, and report to this House such measures as may be necessary, in their opinion, to improve its condition.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND of Virginia,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of the 5th July, 1832, entitled "An act to provide for liquidating and paying certain claims of the State of Virginia," as to embrace officers entitled to five years' full pay, in lieu of half-pay, for life; and the said committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the payment of such judgments as have been, or may be hereafter, recovered against the State of Virginia for half-pay or commutation pay, under the act of the Legislature of Virginia of May, 1779.

On motion of Mr. GRANT, the following resolutions, submitted by him on the 18th instant, were taken up and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to this House the whole amount of postage collected by his department on newspapers for six months, ending the 30th day of June, 1837.

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to this House a statement exhibiting a list of all persons with whom he has contracted to carry the Express Mail; the length of each contract by measurement or estimate; the offices at which the Express Mail is opened on each route; the average weight of each mail, and the annual compensation stipulated to be paid to each and every contractor on express mail routes, and the duration of each contract.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of New York, the following resolution was taken up:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the third section of the act entitled an act granting half-pay to widows or orphans, where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes, approved July 4, 1836, so as to extend the provisions of that section to all widows of officers and soldiers of the war of the Revolution whose husbands were entitled to a pension.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to amend the resolution by adding—"and also to inquire into the expediency of placing on the pension roll, those children whose fathers died in the service, and also those children whose fathers have been Revolutionary pensioners."

Before the question was taken, on motion,

The House adjourned.

The following petitions were presented in the House of Representatives on Monday.

Mr. FOSTER presented the petition of 187 citizens of the State of New York, living in the vicinity of Lake Ontario, praying for the construction of a ship and steamboat canal around the Falls of Niagara, and asking of Congress an appropriation to effect that object.

Mr. CAMBRELENG presented the petition of 180 merchants of the city of New York in favor of the construction of said ship canal.

Mr. HOFFMAN presented the petition of John H. Lord and 286 other citizens of New York, praying for the construction of said canal.

Mr. GRANT presented the petition of Christian J. Bunkle and 551 other citizens of the State of New York, inhabiting the northern boundary of the United States, praying for the construction of said ship and steamboat canal, and asking an appropriation for that purpose.

Also, the petition of John Robinson and 480 other inhabitants of the county of Niagara, in the State of New York, in favor of the same project.

Mr. BIRDSALL presented the petition of William Wickham, of Sodus, New York, praying Congress to pass a law to secure to him the use of a fishery in waters adjacent to lands conveyed by the petitioner to the United States for the erection of a light-house; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Mr. B. also presented the papers of Mr. Fitzhugh, the keeper of the light-house at Sodus, in opposition to the prayer of the above petition; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE GLOBE.

GENTLEMEN: The resolution submitted to the Senate by me, yesterday, was not the resolution published as mine in the Globe of this morning. The following is that which I laid on the table, to be called up on a future day:

"Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the people of the said District to elect a delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to enjoy the rights and privileges of the delegates of the respective Territories of the United States."

In the Globe of yesterday, Mr. CLAY of Alabama is represented to have called for the reading of the resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, presented to the Senate by Mr. SWIFT, in favor of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the suppression of the domestic slave trade between the States, and against the annexation of Texas to the United States. This is also a mistake. I called for the reading of those resolutions, because they were not distinctly described by the Senator presenting them; because, in consequence of this, the Southern Senators seemed not to have noticed their presentation; because, having previously read them, and deeming much of the language in the resolutions, and in the report which accompanied them, to be unconstitutional, inflammatory, and calculated to inflict a serious blow upon the Union of the States, I deemed it my duty to call the special attention of the Senate to them.

Very respectfully,

JOHN NORVELL.

Dec. 21, 1837.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
FRIDAY, December 22, 1837.

After the reading of the journal—

Mr. ADAMS stated that, as his name did not appear among the yeas and nays on the vote on Mr. Patton's resolution of yesterday, nor was his objection entered on the journal, it would not appear that he was present on the occasion.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman that, as he had not answered either "ay" or "no" when his name was called, his name, as a matter of course, could not be recorded:

Mr. ADAMS. I moved at the time that the answer I gave should be entered on the journal, but the Speaker said it was not in order. I then requested that it might be entered on the journal that I made the motion, and that it was declared to be out of order.

The SPEAKER again informed Mr. A. that the reason it did not appear on the journal was, that it was not in order; and referred him to a case precisely of the same nature which occurred during the first session of the last Congress, and which had been so decided by the House.

Mr. ADAMS, after some further remarks, moved that the journal be so amended as to include his objection to the resolution, and his reasons therefor, in the following words:

"I hold the resolution to be a violation of the Constitution of the United States, of the right of my constituents, and of the people of the United States to petition, and of my right to freedom of speech, as a member of this House."

Mr. BOON moved to lay the motion to amend on the table.

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays; which were refused, and the motion to lay on the table was agreed to without a count.

Mr. MERCER, desired to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if it was intended to report any bill touching the clearing out the raft of Red River, or the Cumberland road.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, that those bills were under the charge of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Pope) and at that time in his hands.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the same Committee reported the Senate bill to remit the duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire in the city of New York; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that there was among the estimates not yet printed an appropriation for completing the erection of barracks at Fort Leavenworth, though the Committee of Ways and Means did not find any express law authorizing it. They deemed it expedient, however, that the Committee on Military Affairs should have an opportunity of examining the subject, and that, if they thought proper to do so, they might report a bill for the purpose. The Committee of Ways and Means did not feel authorized to do it; and they had, therefore, directed him to report the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing an appropriation to complete the erection of permanent barracks and quarters at Fort Leavenworth, on the frontier of Missouri, for four companies of dragoons, including stables for their horses, according to a plan approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY expressed a hope that, after the inconvenience so often experienced, no more special orders would be adopted.

Mr. SMITH having so varied his motion, the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question pending was the amendment of Mr. CUSHMAN, viz. to add and also to inquire into the expediency of placing on the pension roll, those children whose fathers died in the service, and also those children whose fathers have been Revolutionary pensioners.

The question was taken on the proposed amendment, when it was rejected: the resolution was then adopted.

On motion,

The House adjourned till Tuesday next.

[Our reporter misconceived the tenor of a portion of Mr. EWING's remarks of yesterday, which we hasten to correct. Mr. EWING's note of what he did say, is as follows:

"The Globe reads that Mr. D. (the member from Cincinnati) evaded my questions by calling upon me to define what Federalism was; when in fact I had propounded the question, 'What does the member mean by his term Federalist? I desire of him to define that appellation.' And I charged that it was evaded, left undefined, but a prescription proffered suitable only for his own case. The Globe also omits my rejoinder to the member's 'next occasion anodyne.' It was, that his prescriptions, whether in the shape of an emetic, cathartic, or anodyne, should only be administered hereafter to those who confided in his skill."]

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 22, 1837.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a plan for the relief of certain insolvent debtors; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, in relation to the receipts at the land offices, and the claims for pre-emption rights: laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WALKER,

Five hundred additional copies were directed to be printed; and

On motion of Mr. TIPTON,

One hundred for the use of the land office.

Mr. CLAY presented a petition from two citizens of the District of Columbia, John Lutz and Jesse Lipscomb, praying remuneration for money lost by permitting improper access, as they charge, on the part of the Post Master, to the office.

This petition sets forth that certain sums of money, regularly mailed in the Post Office at Georgetown, arrived at due time in the city of Baltimore—that at the time the mail must have been received there, a certain editor of a newspaper was allowed to come into the office while the mails were lying exposed—that said editor was in the habit of purloining packages of letters, and was detected in the fact, and the memorialists state they have no doubt their money was among the packages the aforesaid editor stole out of the office. And that this having been done through an indulgence contrary law, on the part of an officer of the Government, they ask whether that Government be not liable. They solicit an investigation, and that adequate reparation be made for the losses they have suffered.

Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial—name not heard: referred to the Committee on Land Claims.

Mr. LYON presented the petition of Joseph Campau, praying Congress to permit him to locate six hundred and forty acres of land, in lieu of a private claim of equal quantity, to which he would have been entitled had he filed his claim in season with the board of land commissioners at Detroit. Also, the petition of Marie Germain, praying to be authorized to locate 422 acres of land in Michigan, in lieu of a like number of acres of a private land claim, which was recommended for confirmation to her by the board of land commissioners at Detroit, and was afterwards sold by the Government. Also, the petition of Anne Smith, praying Congress to grant her an equivalent in lands for certain lands claimed by herself and her sister, which have been sold by the Government.

Mr. KING presented the petitions of R. H. Robinson and others for relief: referred.

Mr. ALLEN presented petitions from Anne Flynn, also from Daniel, praying grants of land: referred to the Committe on the Public Lands.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of T. A. Smith; which was ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of C. Corning, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Patents: granted.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Amos Jones, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the expediency to grant to the Rev. Philander Chase, of Peoria county, State of Illinois, the right of pre-emption to the unappropriated lands of the United States situated in township ten, north of range six, east of the fourth principal meridian, in that State, for the purpose of aiding him in the establishment of a college in that township.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Warren was then taken up.

Mr. CALHOUN explained the circumstances on which this was introduced. Captain Warren was a young gentleman of very brilliant prospects at the commencement of the American Revolution; he was also the protege of a very rich maiden aunt, who, in her zeal for the Crown, had determined that her nephew should enter the English army. This not suiting the views of the young gentleman, who was ardently devoted to liberty, and some interruption occurring in the harmony subsisting between himself and aunt, determined him to attach himself to the cause of the rebels, as they were then termed, and he came to America and embraced the cause of the Colonists. The aunt, shocked at the want of loyalty in her nephew, very humanely wished that he might receive some deep and dangerous wound. In the course of the war, Captain Warren lost his leg, from a wound by a cannon ball; and recollecting the wishes of his aunt in relation to his course, the amputated limb was embalmed, and sent home to her as a trophy of his gallantry, and an evidence that her very kind and charitable wishes had been fulfilled. Mr. Warren was then rich, and while so would have disdained to receive any thing from his country; but the scene was now changed, and though highly respectable, and honorably connected in life, he was compelled to ask the assistance of his country.

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to restrain the issue of small notes in this District, was then taken up, and debated in detail by Messrs. MORRIS, PRESTON, CLAY of Kentucky, WRIGHT, BROWN, STRANGE, HUBBARD, ROANE, WALL, and others.

Mr. PRESTON contended that the measure being confined to this poor disfranchised District should have emanated from the Committee on the District of Columbia; that it was not the province of the Committee on Finance to have reported the bill; that it was legislating for the wants of a people with whom they had no interest in common; and moved to commit it to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WRIGHT had no personal feeling in the matter; if it were the wish of the Senate that it go to the Committee on the District, be it so; but he called the attention of the Senate to a resolution passed on the 11th inst. which referred the subject to the Committee on Finance; and the bill before them was but a transcript of what had passed the Senate at the extra session.

Mr. CLAY urged the commitment of the bill, and spoke of it as a picayune business of which the Committee on Finance ought to be ashamed—that it was calculated to do no good, but was in fact a bill of pains and penalties against the poor people, the negroes and beggar girls of this destitute disfranchised district.

Mr. BROWN opposed the motion to commit, and defended the Committee on Finance from the wanton aspersions thrown upon them. At one time the great Democratic party was a miserable set of Loco Foco sans cullottes; now the Were the haughty aristocrats, seeking to inflict penalties on the poor and wretched. He left gentlemen of the opposition to reconcile these inconsistencies.

Mr. YOUNG said the very extraordinary sympathy indulged in by the Senators from Kentucky and South Carolina, in relation to this "poor, devoted, neglected, disfranchised District," reminded him of an old anecdote of a member of the Illinois Legislature. The member in question, to increase his popularity, had introduced a bill to provide for the marriage of the poor of his county, without any expense. He had no idea that the loves of the young and joyous should be impeded by any tariff on marriage, and he would oblige the clerk of the court to grant certificates without fee, and intimated that he had made arrangements with a philanthropic clergyman to the same effect. Well, the result of all this was that the member who was so desirous of removing what he considered an onerous burden, was well nigh frowned down by the very people he was so anxious to serve, and their remonstrances very soon obliged him to make an active retrograde movement to retain his seat. Might not the feeling of the people of this District be something of a similar character, and might they thank them for the sympathy evinced in endeavoring to fasten upon them this odious and disgraceful system of currency.

Mr. ROANE, as Chairman of the Committee on the District, opposed the reference. Whilst the matter was under debate at the last session, not a single citizen of the District had ever made a communication to him on the subject.

Mr. HUBBARD also opposed the reference, and desired the yeas and nays. This being granted the question stood for commitment 9, against it 30: as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, and Spence—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Lumpkin, Linn, McKean, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—30.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, which was adopted by a vote of 21 to 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Knight, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tipton, Wall, and Williams.—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Alabama, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Linn, Niles, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, White, Wright, and Young—16.

A motion was then made to adjourn, on which Mr. WRIGHT asked the yeas and nays, when the motion was withdrawn.

The bill having been reported as amended, on the question to engross for a third reading,

Mr. WRIGHT asked for the yeas and nays, and the result was, yeas, 31; nays, none.

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Linn, McKean, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—31.

NAYS—None.

The bill as amended reads as follows:

A BILL to restrain the circulation of small notes, as a currency, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, after the tenth day of April next, it shall be unlawful for any individual, company, or corporation, to issue, pass, or to offer to pass, within the District of Columbia, any note, check, draft, bank bill, or any other paper currency, of a less denomination than five dollars; and if any person or corporation shall violate the provisions of this section, the person so offending, or, in case of any corporation so offending, the officers of any such corporation for the time being, shall be liable to indictment by the grand jury of the county within the District where the offence shall have been committed; and the person so offending, or the officers of the corporation so offending, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not exceeding fifty dollars, at the discretion of the court, for every offence: one-half of said fine shall be paid to the prosecutor, the other half shall be for the use of the county where the offence shall have been committed: Provided, That should the prosecutor offer himself, or be admitted, as a witness for the prosecution, he shall forfeit all claim to any part of the penalty, and the whole shall go to the county, and the court shall give judgment accordingly; and the person so offending, and the officers of any corporation, shall also be liable to pay the amount of any note, bill, check, draft, or other paper, constituting part of such currency, to any holder thereof, with all costs incident to the protest and legal collection thereof, with fifty per cent. damages for non-payment on demand, to be recovered by action of debt; and in case of judgment for the plaintiff, execution thereon shall be had forthwith; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the District of Columbia to commence prosecutions against all persons and every coporation offending against this section, of which he shall have knowledge or probable information; and, in case of corporations, the prosecution shall be against the president, or any director or cashier thereof, for the time being; and it shall be the duty of the grand jurors to present all such offences of which they shall have knowledge or probable information; and, that no member of a grand jury shall be ignorant of his duty in this particular, it shall be the duty of the court having cognizance of all offences against this section to give the same in charge to the grand juries, at the commencement of the first term after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful for any individual, company or corporation, to issue, de novo, or knowingly to pass, or procure to be issued, passed, or circulated, within the district aforesaid, any note, check, bank bill, or other paper medium, evidently intended for common circulation, as for, and in lieu of small change in gold or silver, or for any other pretence whatever, and which shall be issued and circulated for the first time after the period above limited in this section, under the penalties provided in the foregoing section.

The Senate then adjourned.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill for the relief of Captain Samuel Warren was read a third time and passed.

The bill restraining the issue of small notes in the District of Columbia: was read a third time, and on the question should the bill pass—

Mr. YOUNG begged leave to propose, by unanimous consent, an amendment describing the denomination of notes to be affected by the provisions of the first section of the bill.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky expressed himself in favor of the amendment, as at the last session Congress had authorized the issue of ten millions of Treasury notes, without particularly specifying their denomination; and should this point not be determined, there might be a danger in passing even the currency authorized by Congress itself. He contended that the relation of the two bills exhibited a curious manner of legislation. The Senate had not on a former occasion scrupled to issue a paper irredeemable in specie, and now they were about to force on this District a course directly opposite. But the notes authorized at the late session were large, (of the denomination of $50 and $100,) adapted solely to the purposes of the rich. While we were now about to append penal denunciation on every thing less than five dollars, applicable directly to the wants of the poorer classes, and to prosecute the offenders before a grand jury: it was an odious sheme at best, and he could see no justice in the measure. The bill, it was true, presented to his mind less objections now, since it had undergone important and salutary modifications. That odious clause regarding the summary mode of punishment and the requisition of oaths, had been stricken out, and, as it now stood, he should have no objection to its passage if it presented features alike applicable to the whole country. He was unwilling to make this little, miserable, ten mile square do that which it was impossible to effect by the efforts of the whole country united. It was true he had hopes, but only hopes, that this desirable issue would be effected throughout; but he could see no reason why this little District, which had always been behind in legislation, should now be forced in advance, and made to bear the brunt for the whole country. It would seem that the whole efforts of the Committee on Finance had been concentrated and expended to produce this little abortion of a bill, affecting only this poor, miserable District, and applicable only to the poor and wretched, the provisions of which, even when broken, could not be construed into crime. This grand national committee, he contended, should have a higher aim in view; it should seek to improve the deranged currency of the whole country, and to do this there was but one applicable remedy, namely: to establish a National Bank, to be conducted by a disinterested corporation, and not by the Executive alone, blending public and private interests; this, he was aware, would not now be done, nor would it be recommended; the hands of the President were tied by this House; it had declared, even at the last session, we should not have a bank, though prayed for by a full majority of the people. He had a special reference in urging the last proposed amendment; he did not wish to see that good functionary, the Secretary of the Treasury, arraigned among the first for a violation of this law, as he most assuredly might be if the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he never entertained an idea that the debate on this bill would have extended to such an unreasonable length as it had on Friday last, when the discussion was of so stirring a nature; and the more was he surprised, as this identical bill had passed at the extra session, with scarcely any opposition, after the clause relating to the banks of this District had been stricken out. Least of all did he expect to hear the honorable Senator from Kentucky denounce the measure in the violent manner he had. The course pursued by him had rendered it manifest who were the opposers of this wretched system of currency, and who its advocates: however doubtful it might have been upon whom the odium of this shin-plaster system rested, that question was now decided! Mr. Buchanan expressed himself not a little astonished at the course pursued by the enemies of the bill. They had, it appeared, retired when the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and the result was a unanimous vote. Why did not gentlemen remain to record their votes against the measure? He felt persuaded that if the question could be submitted to the people of this District, the result would be a decision as unanimous as that of the Senate. Mr. B. contended that the poorer classes were the greatest sufferers from the circulation of these small notes. In many places he had heard and believed, there were large amounts of counterfeit notes of individual issue in circulation, the united effect of which was to injure and embarrass, making the system the greatest curse to the poor. Mr. B. denied altogether the necessity of issuing these shin-plasters on account of the suspension of specie payments. Silver quarter dollars and smaller change had never been exhausted by exportation; that description of money had never, to any extent, been an article of trade; it was hoarded up in bags or old stockings, from whence it would never find its way into circulation, unless forced out by dispensing with the use of those small pieces of irredeemable paper representatives. In some of the western counties of Pennsylvania, where he had been last summer, in which there were no banks, and had been no issue of small notes, he found specie change circulating as formerly; and he doubted not it did generally in the interior, and there the miserable trash was unknown. Should the banks now resume, as he had hopes they speedily would, these paper rags would fall dead in the hands of the holders; and who then would be the greatest sufferers, the poor or the rich? The measure before them was one eminently calculated to benefit the people, by placing among them a sound currency. The law, in Mr. B's opinion, was wise, just and politic. A large majority of the Senate had approved it at the called session, when the time allowed was only thirty days, while now it was extended to the 10th of April next. He thought the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. YOUNG) was not necessary; but he was willing it should be adopted.

Mr. CLAY denied the right of the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan) to charge him with retiring to elude the responsibility of his vote. Was it not presumed when a Senator left the Hall, it was done for legitimate purposes? Had the honorable gentleman himself never retired for legitimate purposes? When, said Mr. C. was I ever known to shrink from meeting any man or any question? Mr. C. said he did not care much about the bill; he did not know but it might have been hammered into something suitable for its purposes, before it was passed.

The Senator from Pennsylvania (said Mr. C.) has made the great discovery that we and our friends are the great supporters of the paper system. Have we not called on the party in power, over and over again, to bring forward some proposition calculated to cure the diseased state of the currency, and how have we been met? Why with a little miserable bill of pains and penalties against the poor people of this ten miles square. Who were the chief actors in the ruin which had overtaken the currency? Why the Senator from Pennsylvania and his co-laborers had produced the fatal consequences, and vain and fruitless would be the attempt to escape from the effects of their blind and deluded measures. We have been told (said Mr. C.) there is plenty of specie in Illinois and Missouri; yes, sir, and how did it get there, but by the baneful operation of that specie circular, which drew it from its legitimate channel, and helped to work the very evil of which the gentleman are complaining? Mr. C. said he had no doubt if the alternative were presented to the poor of specie or these notes they would prefer specie; but this was not the present alternative: it was these notes or nothing!

Mr. C. submitted to the honorable Senator, whether he believed it possible that the banks of this District could pay specie while paper was the universal medium every where else? Mr. C. thought it impossible. There was but one step to take to cure the ill: to establish a United States Bank, which, for forty years, had insured safety to the currency and equality to the exchanges. The Senator from Pennsylvania could not take that course. He had entrenched himself behind the President, behind the Senate, where a negative proposition had been forced through the body, telling the people that if there was a majority in favor of the measure, they should not have it; and yet, (said Mr. C.) while we are deluged with Treasury notes, we are asked to put down the most valuable of the two.

Mr. C. appealed to the VICE PRESIDENT, whether, for the thirty years he had been conversant with the public business, business pertaining to the District had ever been taken from its legitimate sphere, the District of Columbia, to give it to the Committee on Finance? Such a course, he maintained, was unexampled. Why was this business thrust upon Congress from the Committee on Finance, at this early period of the session? Why was it that this committee, supposed to be pre-eminent for its wisdom, for its skill, for its knowledge on national topics, should descend from high station to legislate for this miserable, disfranchised ten miles square? Was such a course statesmanlike? Mr. C. said he was no more a friend to the banks than the Senator from Pennsylvania ought to be, but he did not like this eternal denunciation against them for measures which had been forced upon them by the acts of the Administration.

The conventions, and resolutions coming from New Jersey and elsewhere, were refreshing evidence that something would be done ere long, if the party did not stop in its wild career? Mr. C. maintained that it was not the resolution of Congress that brought about the resumption of specie payments in 1816, but that it was produced by the Bank of the United States; and the same happy result might again be realised, were it not for the unfortunate pledges of the President, and the manifestations of this and the other body that had cut us off for the present from our only resource. Mr. C. cared little further for the bill, since its most objectionable feature had been modified; but he thought the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois was indispensable, or else the Secretary of the Treasury might be the very first to be indicted under the law.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not mean to charge the Senator from Kentucky with withdrawing for the purpose of avoiding the vote; he was aware the gentleman never shrunk from responsibility, let it come in what shape it might. Mr. B. had come into the Senate on Friday after the bill had been discussed, and saw such a beggarly account of empty boxes at the time the question was taken on its engrossment, and that, in conjunction with the enemies of the bill not voting against it, gave room for such an inference: he was willing, however, to take the Senator's own views, and particularly with regard to himself. Mr. B. made some further remarks in reply to Mr. Clay, and maintained that the resumption of 1816 was the result of the resolution of Congress, which forced the measure; many of those banks, however, never did resume, but fell through. Mr. B. was in favor of having these institutions restrained, limited in their operations, so as to make them a public blessing rather than a curse. He wished them to guard in prosperity their discounts, so that the first touches of adversity would not compel them to shut their vaults upon the people, and increase the public misery. Mr. B. avowed himself not entirely a hard money man—that is, he was not in favor of a purely metallic currency, but rather a mixed currency, which should always be convertible at the will of the holder.

Mr. B. said the Senator from Kentucky had asserted that hope was beaming, and appeared to indulge the idea that the present crisis, like that of 1816, was only to be relieved by this sovereign panacea, a United States Bank. Were he (Mr. B.) to admit that institution had been useful in regulating exchange, it might not be more than simple truth; but as things at present stood, he would rather "we bear the ills we have, than fly to others which we knew not of." Rather than have a great institution, with its one hundred millions, spreading its branches every where, concentrating its power here and in England, sapping liberty, and corrupting the elective franchise, he would be willing to pay one, or even two per cent. difference on our exchanges, and think ourselves cheaply off at that. The honorable Senator from Kentucky had indulged much sympathy for the Secretary of the Treasury; but even if the amendment proposed were not adopted, he (Mr. B.) thought the Senator, with his ingenuity and skill, could extricate the Secretary from the difficulty here indicated. Mr. B. knew the Senator's kind feelings would induce him to act as counsel on the occasion. Mr. B. concluded by observing that if we proscribe the circulation of these small notes by the passage of this bill, we should have sound change as a medium, instead of the wretched and filthy rags with which the country was now deluged.

Mr. CLAY had no personal sympathy for the Secretary of the Treasury; for, said Mr. C. should that functionary ever get into difficulty through the action of this law, I would, so help me God, be the last man to help him out. I would never risk my reputation in so hazardous an adventure.

He had made frequent allusion to the Finance Committee. The whole result of their labor in this matter had been like a mountain in labor, and had brought forth a mouse. He wondered the more at the result, as the honorable Senator, at the head of the committee, was proverbial for his abundant lore and love of research; that he, whose lofty demeanor and statesmanlike bearing, should come here and recommend this as a healing measure, was to him remarkable. The gentleman and his colleagues had, since the commencement, strained every nerve, and had produced this six-penny bill to put down shin-plasters. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan) deserved in turn his thanks for his noble concession; that he was no hard money man, but yet he expressed his fears of applying as a remedy for small money, and our present derangements, a United States Bank. Rather let him fear, for our present, our Sub-Treasury scheme, in the hands of one man, the President. Yes, the whole currency of the country subject to the arbitrary will of one individual. He (Mr. C.) contended that the calamities of a war, in the most horrid extreme, were less to be feared than the continuance of such a scheme. But his opposers need not fear; he should not shock their modesty by offering any plan for a national bank while he continued with his hands tied as they were at present. This movement must now come from them when they should see the misery and destruction of their own course.

Mr. BUCHANAN could see no good ground for the honorable Senator's (Mr. Clay) allusions to the Committee. He seemed particularly horrified at the idea of a Sub-Treasury plan, and to this he would prefer even the misery and calamity of a war in its worst features. The whole ground of his opposition seems to be the fact that the Government can disburse its claims without recourse to the bank. He had likened the Committee to a mountain and the bill to a mouse; yet he confessed this was unexpected, as from the gentleman's well known courage and chivalry, he would not have supposed he would so long have fought a mouse whether large or small. He must attribute his course to motives of pity for the mouse in question, not from fear of any danger it might produce.

Mr. PRENTISS expressed himself in favor of the amendment.

Mr. NILES said that if he could be surprised at any thing which might occcur here, he should have been at the extraordinary opposition which this bill had encountered. He had himself no strong feeling on the subject; at the late session, after the sections were stricken from the bill which related to the banks of the District, he cared little what became of it, and took no further part in the matter. But at that time, after those sections were stricken out, all opposition to the measure appeared to be given up, and it passed without scarcely a dissenting voice. Then there appeared to be no one who was prepared to resist a measure having no other operation than to discountenance and drive out of circulation the small notes issued by any body and every body, and which all appeared to regard as a common nuisance. But, sir, we now witness a very different state of things. This measure, which we are in one breath told is a picayune bill, too small and trifling a matter to be brought before the Senate, and the committee are severely reproached for reporting it: in the next, it is treated as a measure of the utmost importance, and it is assailed in the most vehement manner, and by bursts of indignant passion, fierce denunciation and violence, not surpassed since the memorable panic session of 1834.

Sir, whence proceeds this violent opposition to a measure declared to be of so little importance? Does it come from a solicitude and regard for the people of the District? Not so, for we hear nothing from them; they have not moved or taken any interest in the matter. The bill having passed the Senate at the late session, they had reason to suppose that it would be interduced again at the regular session, and have had ample time and opportunity to oppose it. Where are the petitions, the remonstrances from the people of the District against it? He had heard of none: the gentleman have referred to none: there is then no opposition from the District.

Sir, the opposition to this little picayune bill, comes from a higher source; it comes from the same quarter, and from the same considerations, whence have proceeded the opposition to every other measure, whatever might be its object, in relation to the currency: it comes from the advocates of a national bank; from those who seem determined that the monetary affairs of the country shall remain in confusion and disorder, until they can be regulated in their way, and by their favorite measure. Sir, we have, fortunately, a key which opens this whole matter; which removes all doubt, if any could otherwise exist. The country has been explicitly and frankly told, by the very organ of the bank and the bank party, that that measure is not to be carried by discussion; that the time for argument had gone past; that it was only by the sufferings of the people that they could ever be induced to give their sanction to a national bank. The currency is not to be restored; the panic and distress, if possible, are to be prolonged, and the disquietude in the public mind is to be continued. The people are to be made to feel the importance of a national bank; they are to be forced into that measure by their "sufferings." Hence the opposition to this bill, intended to improve the currency of the District.

But the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) says this is beginning at the wrong end; and he calls on the majority to come forward with their comprehensive measures, adapted to the condition of the country, and calculated to restore the currency from the confusion and disorder into which it has been thrown by the Administration. But he (Mr. N.) believed it would be difficult for the committee to find the right end at which to commence their measures, or the right measures to introduce, so far as the Senator was concerned, unless they were prepared to recommend a National Bank. The gentleman calls on the committee for some general measure for relieving the disorders in the currency of the whole country; but how does he treat the measures of that description which were proposed, and some of them adopted, at the late session?

We have just heard his opinion of one of those measures—that of authorizing the issue of Treasury notes. He has treated these notes, resting on the faith and credit of the United States, as being more worthless than that currency which this bill is designed to suppress, and which is so vicious and polluted that the Senator would not make use of the term by which it is usually designated. The Treasury notes, he says, are depreciated below the shin-plasters of this District. Such is the estimation in which the gentleman holds one of the measures adopted for the relief of the country. But how are the facts? Is it not known to every body, that these Treasury notes are at a premium as compared with bank notes, and, in some parts of the Union, at a considerable premium? These notes circulate through the country, and, in that respect, have an advantage over the best bank paper in the country; and yet they are denounced as worthless, worse than the miserable spurious currency of the District. Is it not apparent that no other than the Senator's favorite currency will answer? Every thing else is worthless.

And what does the Senator say of another measure, which received the sanction of the Senate at the late session? I refer to the bill providing for the keeping and disbursement of the public revenues. In his remarks upon this bill, when on its second reading, he denounced that bill, no way connected with the subject under debate, as an "execrable measure." Mr. N. said he heard the remark at the time with astonishment and with some emotion, and expected that it would have been replied to and repelled on the spot. He had forborne to notice it, thinking that older and more experienced members of the body would not suffer it to pass. But as it had not been noticed, he would now repel the opprobious denunciation, and throw it back from whence it came. Is it so, that a measure which has received the sanction of one co-ordinate branch of this Government, and, after full debate, has passed one branch of the Legislature, is to be denounced as an "execrable measure," as an accursed measure—for that is the meaning of the language—is to be anathematized, and attempted to be held up to public scorn? And on what ground does the honorable Senator thus characterize this measure? He did not condescend to inform us. Would he have the public believe that this measure violates the Constitution, or that it was a blow aimed at the liberties of the country? In all the anathemas which have been hurled against it, he had not heard it charged as a violation of the Constitution.

Is the measure denounced on the ground that it has been repudiated by public opinion? Sir, that remains to be determined, the question is still pending; it is now before the great tribunal of public opinion, and the verdict of the people has not yet been rendered. The gentleman may suppose that public sentiment is against it; but others think very differently; the question has been but a few months before the country; there has hardly been time for it to be fully discussed and examined: for his own part, he was fully satisfied, that time and opportunity for a full examination of its merits were all that was wanted to command the approbation and approval of a decided majority of the people of the United States. He sincerely believed that measure was destined, not only to be approved, but to become pre-eminently popular with the people of this country.

But, said Mr. N. suppose the fact was so, that a majority of the people had disapproved of this measure, would that justify its being denounced as execrable? Will the Senator rest his anathemas on that ground? He thought that would be a dangerous position for the Senator to take. He had himself been the author of too many favorite schemes, projects, and hobbies, most of which had received their quietus from public opinion. Where is the Senator's American system, which, for a time, was the idol that received his homage and that of his party? Where are his high tariffs, internal improvements? Where his land bill, and numerous schemes for distributing surpluses? Have not all these measures received the stamp of public condemnation? Yet, much as he, Mr. N. disapproved of most of those measures, he should not think of characterizing them as "execrable." And how stands the case as to the Senator's favorite measure—a National Bank, which he and his friends are attempting to force upon the country, through the sufferings of the people? Has not that also received the reprobation of public opinion, and that more than once? What other measure has ever been so distinctly brought before the public, and an issue so directly formed, as that of a National Bank? More than once has the question of bank or no bank been before the country, and decided by the people. But are its advocates satisfied? Far from it. And if there ever was a question upon which adventitious circumstances and sinster influences were brought to operate, it was this question. This institution, with its thirty-five millions of capital, did not lie still and quietly wait the decision of the question. Instead of this, it openly took the field, and brought all its immense power and influence to bear on public opinion. Whilst it poured out its money free as water to hire writers and orators, it applied the screws itself, and appealed to the "sufferings" of the people. An immense influence was thrown into its scale from the interest of its stockholders, customers, and debtors, with their thousand ramifications throughout the country. It appeared from the examination of the committee of Congress, that no less than ninety-four thousand dollars were expended during this bank war for publishing the speeches of the honorable Senator and his friends, and other matter designed to sustain the bank. Yet with all this sinister influence bearing on the question, the integrity and patriotism of the people prevailed, and the bank was condemned.

Sir, does it become those who are now pressing on the country this thrice repudiated measure, to denounce other financial measures, upon which the nation has not yet decided, as "execrable?" Sir, the divorce bill, as it is sometimes called, is not the only measure which has been denounced as execrable. What did the Senator say in 1834 of the pet bank scheme? Was not that then denounced as an execrable measure—as a measure tyrannical and corrupt, which gave the President the entire control of the public purse, and enabled him to buy up the State banks, and use them for purposes of corruption and to control the elections? Then the pet bank system, which now seems to be coming into favor, was execrable, abominable, corrupt, and comprised all the evils of Pandora's box.

And yet the Senator asks for our measures for restoring the currency. There is but one measure that will answer for him; all others, no matter what they are, are "execrable," and that one measure is to be forced upon the country by prolonging the disorders of the currency, and by the sufferings of the country. The independent spirit, the honest patriotism, the incorruptible integrity of the people, are to be humbled and subdued, and all are to be compelled, to pay their homage to the great Bank Idol, the paper money Juggernaut, which can boast of more victims, and of more illustrious victims, crushed beneath its blood stained car, than the grim Moloch of India.

Mr. SWIFT expressed his entire indifference as to the passage of the bill. It would prove useless legislation at best, as laws to the same effect had been passed in other quarters, and were never in one instance observed. The people would in any instance consult their own convenience as far as possible in the matter of the small change in use as a currency.

Mr. WRIGHT had no choice, personally, whether the bill with or without the amendment should be adopted or rejected. He regretted making a single remark at this time, but felt himself called upon to do so from the frequent allusions which had been made to himself and the Committee on Finance, of which he was chairman.

The bill had met with signal opposition from its first introduction, and, in connection, he had not been exempted from blame. He had done but what he considered a duty, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate inquiring of that committee the expediency of a bill to the effect the one in question was calculated to produce.

A bill of a character precisely similar, and in nearly the same words, had passed the Senate the last session, and as that proceeding had expressed the sense of the Senate on the subject, he had expected no opposition at present.

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) had objected to reporting the bill when so many of the members of the committee were absent. Five of the members were in town at the time, and why they were not present with the committee he could not tell, nor was it his duty to inquire. When the bill was reported last session the great leader (Mr. Webster) of the interests the honorable Senator (Mr. Clay) so ably advocated, was a member of the committee, and the provisions thereof met at the time his full concurrence. This distinguished member was now absent—why, he knew not.

He asked to be remembered in justice on either hand. If the committee in its present state could not act upon bills of higher importance, nor on those of a nature to the one in question, how were they to proceed in performance of their duty to the Senate or the nation? That it deserved the epithet of a picayune bill, was not his fault: it was just what the committee instructed him to report. Of little note as it might be considered, it had proved itself of sufficient importance to draw forth the highest indignation from sources most vitally important in his estimation.

There was another point of view. The committee had, in the course of debate, been told they ought to be ashamed of themselves for reporting such a bill. Himself, a leading member of the committee, had felt severely castigated by the remark, coming as it did from so distinguished a source; yet was he confident of exemption from censure by the Senate. He considered that the honorable Senator (Mr. Clay) had but ill estimated his position, or the ground he had taken, in applying censure to the committee for the matter in which the bill had been reported. For himself he had a higher aim in view, which was the conscientious discharge of his duty.

Mr. CLAY denied having censured the committee for reporting the bill at the early day they did, or when they were not all in session. He never doubted or questioned the power of the committee to report at an earlier or later period. He had merely inquired if the bill was first reported by unanimous consent of the committee. Nor would he object to the provisions of the bill as now amended, were it not from its motive calculated, or by the committee intended, to extend its influence beyond the confines of the District. His objection was, and had been, that it was a local measure brought forward, tending to produce a general effect with regard to the epithets he had bestowed upon the bill. He contended that it was in accordance with parlimentary usuage, when a bill was under discussion, to make use of any language best expressive of the Speaker's views. He had said, and still contended, that the features of the bill as first presented, were abominables and it was to the clauses therein contained which referred to the summary disposal of offenders, and the oaths prescribed, that he alluded when he remarked "the committee ought to be ashamed for presenting them;" as the bill was now no longer the same, it no longer called for his reprehension. He had hoped as the Senator from New York (Mr. Wright) had suffered these reflections to rest for a week without notice, that he (Mr. C.) should have been spared this eclaircissement at so late an hour.

Mr. WRIGHT replied that the honorable Senator (Mr. Clay) must be mistaken, if he for a moment supposed that he (Mr. W.) complained of any personalities; yet, possessing his (Mr. C's) chivalrous temperament, he could never have expected him to remain silent under remarks which, if not personal, were, to say the least, mortifying. As regarded the limited or general effects of the bill, he had never given it a thought; but he could see nothing objectionable in its features if it should prove so general in its application as to drive this depreciated small money out of the country.

Mr. CLAY inquired if the Senator from New York supposed the effect of the bill would be to produce specie payments throughout the country. If so, he would give it his hearty concurrence. It was inefficient, both in a local and general view; yet he should be quite happy if it should prove potent enough to produce the effect just alluded to. But as the bill was now so far stripped of its odious features, and likely in its present form to be so harmless in its direct effect, he would, to gratify his friend from New York, acquiesce in its final passage, and give it the support of his vote.

Mr. PRESTON had no objection to the bill, as amended, and should give it his support.

Mr. NILES, said the Senator was greatly mistaken if he supposed that he, Mr. N. had excepted to his remark, denouncing the measure referred to as execrable solely or mainly on account of its having been recommended by the President: it was more on account of its having received the sanction of a majority of this body, after a very long debate, distinguished by unusual ability. It was because the measure was still pending before the country, and had met the approbation of a large portion of the people, whether a majority or not no one could say, and had been approved almost unanimously by one of the sovereign States of this Union. To denounce a measure as execrable to which a majority of the Senate have given their support, he considered as disrespectful and highly offensive to the body, or to the majority. The Senator thinks differently, and regards such language as within the proper license of parlimentary debate, and he has again repeated the same denunciation. Mr. N. said he should join no issue with the gentleman on that point; he raised no question of order; if it was a right of the Senator to denounce and execrate measures which he had supported, he could only say, that he should claim, and fearlessly exercise the right, which belonged to him, of repelling such denunciation, such unfounded imputations, with the contempt and indignation they deserved. He was for always balancing accounts on the spot. He should not dispute the gentleman's right to deal out his anathemas, but he would say that such language was unworthy of him, and unworthy of the place.

It might be more convenient to denounce measures, and to endeavor to fix upon them a bad name, than to refute the arguments by which they were supported. He should prefer, however, to have the Senator attempt to answer the arguments of the friends of this reprobated measure; he should like to see him refute, if he can, the triumphant argument of his friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Buchanan,) to say nothing of those from many other gentlemen. When he has done this, when he has fairly met and overthrown the arguments of the friends of the measure, his denunciations might not appear quite so objectionable. The Senator complains that this matter had been suffered to rest three or four days, and after this lapse of time, and after the Sabbath had intervened, it was brought forward as a subject of reproof, and that he (Mr. N.) had read a lecture to him. Mr. N. said he had already explained why he did not notice the matter at the time; he had waited for some more experienced and able member to do so; but as it had not been done, he had availed himself of the first opportunity. As to the Sabbath having intervened, he regarded that as a fortunate circumstance, as he presumed the gentleman had employed that holy day in sober, serious, if not religious, meditations; and he was happy to perceive that there was evidence that such had been the case. The storm of Friday has not recurred to-day; the Senator appears more calm and composed, and with subdued emotions; for which we are no doubt indebted to his serious reflections during the Sabbath.

But (said Mr. N.) I have read no lecture to the Senator. I never have, and never shall, read lectures to any Senator, and, last of all, to that gentleman. There are two sufficient reasons against it. The first, that it would be presumption for him to do it; and the second, he was persuaded that it would be labor entirely lost. He should lecture no one, he should reproach no one, and should endeavor to give no one occasion to lecture him,

He should go on in his quiet, calm, "amiable" way; but should endeavor candidly, fairly and fearlessly, to discharge his duty to his constituents and to the country, regardless of denunciations, or reproaches, or hard words, or hard names, let them come from what quarter they might.

Sir, no one better understands or more dexterously practices, the maxim, "that names are things," than that gentleman; in his long course of political warfare, he has found that names are cheaper than facts or arguments, and are a ready resource when the latter may not be at hand. Like the honest and humane quaker, who abhorred taking life or shedding blood, he could not even kill his dog, yet he could go into the street, and give him a bad name; he could cry "Mad dog!" And the Senator, when he cannot successfully oppose measures by argument and fair discussion, thinks he can destroy them by denunciations, execrations, and by giving them a bad name. The gentleman and his friends have had much experience in this way; the adroit use of names is a game they have long been playing. They have improved on the maxim that names are things, as they seem to suppose that names will alter things, will change principles, will make right wrong, and wrong right. Yes, sir: it seems to be believed by these experienced tacticians, that the people can be hoodwinked and deceived by a skilful use of names discreetly applied; that good men and good measures can, by fixing upon them a bad name, be rendered unpopular, odious, and execrable; and that bad measures—measures which have been thrice repudiated by the people—and, he would not say bad men, but men who have lost the popular favor and forfeited the public confidence, could, simply by the magic of a good name, a popular name, regain the character they had lost, and become once more the favorites of the people.

Mr. CLAY had but a word to say. He hoped his amiable friend from Connecticut (Mr. N.) would spare him a little—would not crucify him outright—but when viewing his (Mr. C's) motives, would put on different spectacles. He (Mr. N.) had had his eyes, too long, perhaps, turned toward a certain building he could name. Should the honorable Senator, instead, study a little more of parliamentary etiquette, he might find to what length epithet might be applied to sentiment.

Mr. NILES. The Senator alludes to the "White House," and intimates that he (Mr. N.) was under some magic influence from that quarter; he could assure him he was entirely mistaken; the White House had no special attractions and no terrors with him; he asked nothing, expected nothing, and feared nothing, from that quarter; he, however, respected the present occupant of the White House as a man, and had full confidence in his capacity, his sound discretion, his integrity, and his enlightened and patriotic sentiments, as Chief Magistrate of this great Republic. He had also more than respected—he had felt the highest admiration for—the illustrious and venerable man who had recently occupied that House, but he had neither asked or desired any thing from either. I can say (said Mr. N.) this much in relation to the White House. Can the Senator say as much? Has the White House no attractions for him? Has he never cast a longing eye toward it? Has it no influence on his actions here? Sir, (said Mr. N.) I hope I shall be excused for referring to a fact communicated to me the other day by one of the city wags, which was, that a distinguished Senator, who had not visited the White House for more than eight years, had recently been there; he regarded the circumstance as highly important and very suspicious, but was well satisfied in his own mind that the object of the Senator was to examine the premises, and to satisfy himself whether they would be likely to be in a tenantable condition about three years hence.

The yeas and nays were then taken, at the suggestion of Mr. BUCHANAN, on the final passage of the bill, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright and Young—37.

NAY—Mr. Swift.

The Senate then went into Executive business, and at the conclusion of which,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, Dec. 26, 1837.

After the reading of the journal,

Mr. CAMPBELL asked leave to make a statement in relation to a paragraph which had recently appeared in a newspaper headed "Dissolution of the Union." Leave being granted, Mr. C. read the paragraph alluded to, which stated, in substance, that Mr. C. had invited the southern delegation, among other objects, to meet for the purpose of considering a proposition for the dissolution of the Union.

Mr. C. then observed, that if he alone were interested in the matter, he would not have called the attention of the House to a paragraph emanating from an irresponsible letter-writer, but as other members, Messrs. Bouldin and Johnson of Virginia, as well as himself were involved in the charge, he deemed it his duty to state to the House, that on the occasion alluded to, no reference was made, either directly or indirectly to the dissolution of the Union; it being evident to all that the course adopted on that occasion, was calculated to allay excitement, rather than to affect the stability of the Union.

MEXICO.

The first business in order was on the reference of a memorial presented by Mr. ADAMS on Monday week, from the New York Peace Society, and other individuals friendly to the peace cause, praying Congress to accede to the proposition of the Mexican Congress.

[This proposition was couched in the following terms, contained in a decree of that Congress, dated May 20, 1837, viz:

"The Government is hereby authorized to compromise the claims which the Government of the United States has instituted, or may hereafter institute; and those in which they cannot agree, may be submitted to the decision of a friendly Power, the United States of America agreeing thereto."]

Mr. ADAMS had moved to refer the memorial to a select committee, with instructions "to read, consider, and report thereon."

Mr. HOWARD moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; which motion taking precedence,

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend it, by adding the same instructions to that committee.

Mr. A. now modified his amendment, by omitting the instruction "to read."

Mr. ADAMS proceeded to address the House at length in support of his motion, and made some allusions to the conduct of the Committee of Ways and Means at the last session, in reporting a resolution adverse to a national bank, without reading the memorials thereon. He was several times admonished by the CHAIR for irrelevancy of argument. The House gave Mr. A. leave to proceed, by a vote of 118 to 30.

Mr. HOWARD replied to Mr. A. and urged upon the House not to require one of its committees to report upon a subject which had not been officially communicated to it; for no such proposition had ever been made to the Government of the United States by Mexico.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, after two or three hours had been already occupied in this very grave discussion, for they had been two hours and a half in determining whether one committee or another should be instructed to report upon this question, and in its introduction the gentleman from Massachusetts had done Mr. C. the honor to notice him specially, and he should say now, what must be evident to all, that the gentleman from Massachusetts was about to employ this session as he did the last and the preceding ones, in hunting up materials for attacks upon the Speaker of the House, and upon the Committee of Ways and Means; a very laudable object, and one worthy of his high ambition!

Mr. C. however felt it due to say to the House, once for all, that the duty he owed to himself, the regard he had for the dignity of the House, and the respect he had for the exalted station that gentleman once filled, would always prevent him from imitating his example in violating decorum and the rules of order. He should regret to be called to order, and to be directed day after day, by the Speaker and the members of the House, to take his seat for transgressing the rules. The gentleman appeared as the champion of one of his (Mr. A's) colleagues. Mr. C. congratulated both the champion and the ——— but he would not designate the gentleman.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had attacked the Committee of Ways and Means for not reading the memorials presented at the late session for the establishment of a National Bank. Here they are, said Mr. C. (holding them in his hand.) Five and forty of them from every quarter of this Union; forty-four of them beginning with the following annunciation: "That in the midst of profound peace, embarrassed by no great political struggles." He took up a second and a third commencing with the same. Some of them are in manuscript and some printed, coming from every State and Territory, but all commencing with "that in the midst of profound peace, embarrassed by no great political struggles." They had been printed twenty times over, by order of the House. Every member of the committee had read them a half dozen times over.

Now, sir, (continued Mr. C.) if these questions should ever come before us again, this novel, this fresh, this interesting subject, of the establishment of a Bank of the United States, I think I should propose in the committee that a sub-committee be appointed to read all these memorials seriatim; and I should, by way of assurance that the selected committee would do its duty, ask the House to appoint the Committee on Manufactures (of which Mr. Adams is chairman) to perform that task in their leisure hours. Then, undoubtedly, all these forty-five memorials would be read upon this novel, this fresh, this interesting question. But, if the majority of that committee are so reprehensible, if they merit the contempt and scorn of this nation, if the gentleman from Massachusetts is so horrified at their conduct, pray what must the gentlemen think of the minority of that committee who did not ask for the reading of the very petitions they advocated, when the question was three times brought before the committee. What was the who were, before the meeting of Congress, so exceedingly anxious for a national bank, but who, after all these professions, came there and proposed no such thing. The petitions were before the committee; they were bound to act upon them, and they reported against them.

Mr. HAYNES said he should address himself very briefly to the attention of the House, nor should he, whatever might be his feelings, take up any of the irrelevant topics which had so unnecessarily been drawn into this discussion. He would only offer a very few observations in addition to what had been said by his honorable friend from Maryland, (Mr. Howard,) and his honorable friend and colleague, (Mr. Dawson.) When the memorial under discussion was presented, he had very strong doubts whether it ought to be referred either to a select or standing committee of the House. Further reflection has satisfied him that it should be referred to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, and reported on by that committee. The memorial alleges a fact which, so far as we have been informed by the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, has never been communicated to the American Government. That alleged fact has been spread before the country, not only by the memorial itself, but by the remarks of the honorable gentleman who introduced it, (Mr. Adams) and he was not willing it should pass unexamined by the appropriate committee of this House, nor that an impression should be suffered to rest upon the public mind, that a proposition of conciliation and peace had been tendered by Mexico to this country, when no such proposition had ever been communicated to the American Executive. But, (he said) he had decided objections to the instructions proposed by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams.) The purpose of those instructions was obvious enough; but the honorable mover, who was not in the habit of concealment, had distinctly told the House that their original terms were intended in reference to a recent affair between the members of another committe of this House.

He objected to the proposed instructions, because they were new and unusual. This House was not in the habit of instructing its committees upon any subject, unless it had determined upon some particular course of legislation. For example, upon the recommitment of a bill which has been considered, the committee is sometimes instructed to report particular provisions; but it is altogether unusual to instruct upon a mere matter of reference to a committee. But there was another and fundamental objection to the proposed instructions. They conveyed an unjust imputation, not only on the Committee of Foreign Affairs, but upon every other committee of this House. He could not, therefore, consent to their adoption. The honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. Tillinghast,) when proposing a modification of the instructions, by withdrawing the offensive part, insists upon retaining so much as requires the committee to report. Since I have risen, a friend has turned my attention to the seventy-sixth rule, which prescribes the duties of the Committee of Foreign Affairs. By that rule, it is made the duty of the committee to consider and report their opinion upon all subjects touching our foreign relations, which may be referred to them. Why, then, the necessity of this tautology, this work of supererogation, of instructing that committee to do what, by the law of this House, it is already their duty to do?

After some further remarks from Messrs. ADAMS, DAWSON, and HOWARD,

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved to strike out the word "to consider;" which Mr. ADAMS accepted as a modification.

The amendment was then rejected—ayes 51, noes 84.

The question recuring on the reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs,

Mr. ADAMS again addressed the House on the subject of our relations with Mexico, &c.

Mr. HOWARD briefly replied; after which the question was taken on his motion of reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; but there being no quorum present,

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

Private petitions were presented by Messrs. PRENTISS, NICHOLAS, TIPTON, and others, and severally appropriately referred.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of C. C. Cammell, and other offices of the Mississippi Land Company: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FULTON presented a petition of W. and H. Pulford, heirs of a Revolutionary officer, for relief: referred to Committee on Claims.

The bill authorizing the States to tax lands within their respective limits was then taken up, and discussed to a late hour—Mr. CLAY of Kentucky opposing, and Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, NORVELL, WALKER, ALLEN, BUCHANAN, and others, advocating it.

The vote on the engrossment for a third reading was taken by yeas and nays; when there appeared 35 for, and 4 against it, as follows:

Also, that he inform the Senate of the aggregate amount of specie which has been paid out for all purposes since the said stoppage of specie payments in May last, and specifying the general objects for which the payments have been made.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the District Judge of New Hampshire.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON,

On motion of Mr. KING,

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Wetumpka Railroad Company to run their road through the public lands.

Mr. CALHOUN then submitted the following resolutions.

Resolved, That in the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the States adopting the same acted, severally, as free, independent, and sovereign States; and that each, for itself, by its own voluntary assent, entered the Union with the view to its increased security against all dangers, domestic as well as foreign, and the more perfect and secure enjoyment of its advantages, natural, political, and social.

Resolved, That in delegating a portion of their powers to be exercised by the Federal Government, the States retained, severally, the exclusive and sole right over their own domestic institutions and police, and are alone responsible for them, and that any intermeddling of any one or more States, or a combination of their citizens, with the domestic institutions and police of the others, on any ground, or under any pretext whatever, political, moral, or religious, with the view to their alteration, or subversion, is an assumption of superiority not warranted by the Constitution; insulting to the States interfered with, tending to endanger their domestic peace and tranquillity, subversive of the objects for which the Constitution was formed, and, by necessary consequence, tending to weaken and destroy the Union itself.

Resolved, That this Government was instituted and adopted by the several States of this Union as a common agent, in order to carry into effect the powers which they had delegated by the Constitution for their mutual security and prosperity; and that, in fulfilment of this high and sacred trust, this Government is bound so to exercise its powers as to give, as far as may be practicable, increased stability and security to the domestic institutions of the States that compose the Union; and that it is the solemn duty of the Government to resist all attempts by one portion of the Union to use it as an instrument to attack the domestic institutions of another, or to weaken or destroy such institutions, instead of strengthening and upholding them, as it is in duty bound to do.

Resolved, That domestic slavery, as it exists in the Southern and Western States of this Union, composes an important part of their domestic institutions, inherited from their ancestors, and existing at the adoption of the Constitution, by which it is recognised as constituting an essential element in the distribution of its powers among the States; and that no change of opinion, or feeling, on the part of the other States of the Union in relation to it, can justify them or their citizens in open and systematic attacks thereon, with the view to its overthrow; and that all such attacks are in manifest violation of the mutual and solemn pledge to protect and defend each other, given by the States, respectively, on entering into the Constitutional compact, which formed the Union, and as such is a manifest breach of faith, and a violation of the most solemn obligations, moral and religious.

Resolved, That the intermeddling of any State or States, or their citizens, to abolish slavery in this District, or any of the Territories, on the ground, or under the pretext, that it is immoral or sinful; or the passage of any act or measure of Congress, with that view, would be a direct and dangerous attack on the institutions of all the slaveholding States.

Resolved, That the union of these States rests on an equality of rights and advantages among its members; and that whatever destroys that equality, tends to destroy the Union itself; and that it is the solemn duty of all, and more especially of this body, which represents the States in their corporate capacity, to resist all attempts to discriminate between the States in extending the benefits of the Government to the several portions of the Union; and that to refuse to extend to the Southern and Western States any advantage which would tend to strengthen, or render them more secure, or increase their limits or population by the annexation of new territory or States, on the assumption or under the pretext that the institution of slavery, as it exists among them, is immoral or sinful, or otherwise obnoxious, would be contrary to that equality of rights and advantages which the Constitution was intended to secure alike to all the members of the Union, and would, in effect, disfranchise the slaveholding States, withholding from them the advantages, while it subjected them to the burthens, of the Government.

Mr. PRESTON remarked that his feelings in regard to the subject of the resolutions were in full unison with those of his colleague, (Mr. Calhoun) but from the simple reading, he could but gather the sentiments they contained in an abstract form. Yet he would suggest the propriety of some delay in the action of the Senate thereon; as the resolutions from the State of Vermont, shortly to be offered by the Senator from that State, might bring the subject forward in a more applicable form, and anticipate the spirit and sentiments of the resolutions just offered. It had been some years since remarked on the floor of the Senate, that the time had gone by when legislations, by means of resolutions, would be sufficient to meet the wishes of the country on a subject so vitally important. He was still of the same opinion. The settlement of mere abstractions of principles will never answer the desired end. These remarks he had made simply to remind the Senate that it had been his intention, and was so still, to bring the matter forward in some more forcible and effective form at a future day.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that this was a brief and direct mode of reaching the subject. He did not feel disposed to await any action on the Vermont resolutions. He was prepared to act now; and as the resolutions just offered contained the whole gist of the matter at issue, he saw no necessity for further delay. He hoped there would be no opposition to the motion to print, as then each member would be enabled the more readily to determine in his mind what course was proper to pursue, let the subject come in whatever shape it might.

The motion to print was then agreed to.

And the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, Dec. 27, 1837.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, in answer to their resolution of the 9th of October last.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 26, 1837.

[The resolution referred to was in relation to any settlements on the Columbia river.]

The Message having been read, was, on motion of Mr. CRAIG, laid on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the examinations made by the Department of War on the claims of the State of Massachusetts, for military services and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain; which, on motion of Mr. GRENNELL, was laid on the table.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The SPEAKER said he had had placed in his hands a communication from Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Wood, claiming seats as Representatives from the State of Mississippi on the floor of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina called for the reading of the papers.

They consisted of a letter from the two gentlemen, and the certificate of Governor Lynch of their return, etc.; and having been read,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved their reference to the Committee of Elections, and that they be printed.

Mr. BELL understood the application of the two gentlemen was, to be admitted to their qualification and sworn, and he supposed the Chair, or rather the House, would have to decide upon this application. The gentleman from New York had stated no grounds upon which he moved the reference, and Mr. B. had considerable difficulties about what course should be adopted. In the case of Arkansas, he believed the gentleman from that State had been admitted and was sworn by the Speaker, on motion of a gentleman. He begged leave to inquire of that honorable member whether he had resigned his seat?

Mr. YELL replied that he had not.

Mr. BELL resumed, that if he had not been misinformed, in relation to the questions contested at the last session, the case of the gentleman from Arkansas was precisely the same as that of the gentleman from Mississippi. Upon what principle the gentleman from Arkansas was qualified a second time, he could not say. If he were already a member, the oath could not be administered to him a second time. He made these remarks, in order that the House might act consistently, though he admitted the case was one of some difficulty. It would, perhaps, be better to refer it to the House, who might take an order on it, for it was without precedent. If the gentleman from New York had made his motion to refer the subject to the Committee of Elections, on the ground that there were other gentlemen claiming the same seats, that would offer a reason; but really the case of Arkansas seemed to have been regarded by the Chair, and by the House, too, in making no objection, as if there had been a vacancy. The journals would show, in the absence, certainly, of a word to the contrary, that it was taken for granted by the House that there was a vacancy in that case, and the gentleman from Arkansas had presented the evidence of his new election, had qualified, and had been admitted by the Chair to qualify as a member elect. Mr. B. had stated these circumstances that the House might come to some decision that might maintain their conformity and consistency.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had not thought it necessary to state his reasons for the motion of reference, because he felt satisfied the members on all sides would see the necessity of adopting the usual course. It was a question always heretofore referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. YELL said it was perhaps due to all the gentlemen that he should say something in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, in drawing a parallel between the case of Arkansas and Mississippi. It was true that Mr. Y. was sworn in at the present session; but he nevertheless considered his case different from that of Mississippi. Although he had been elected by the people at the called session, it was on the distinct understanding, in Arkansas, that it was for the called session only. His friends, it was true, thought otherwise, and that he was entitled to his seat for the whole Congress; but that no excuse should be made, that no censure should be cast upon him, no question should be raised in reference to his election, he determined to waive all the right, and told the people if he should not be elected again he would resign his seat. Now, having submitted his claim to the people a second time, he should have been derelict in his duty and professions to them if he had claimed his seat under the first election, and not have qualified over again. He had, therefore, thought it due to the people of Arkansas and to himself, even if he had been legally and constitutionally elected the first time, to claim his seat under the ensuing election. Moreover, he thought it no harm to be sworn over again; for he believed if the House was sworn once a month it would do no harm; for if the House should have contended that he was not elected for two years, then he would have been sitting there without having been sworn at all.

Mr. BELL said that he did not mean to impugn the gentleman.

Mr. YELL did not so understand the gentleman. Mr. Y. was only explaining his course. Now, if he understood the question, these gentlemen, the sitting members, had not submitted the question to the people of Mississippi. He had done so; and that made his an entirely different case.

Mr. GRAVES suggested to the gentleman whether it would not be as well to adopt the usual course, viz: to admit the gentlemen claiming to seats on the floor, in order to hear what was said, and to permit them to address the House, if they chose, on their case. The question might then be fairly argued on its merits.

Mr. YELL had not risen to argue the question, or even to point out any particular course he might deem necessary. As to the gentleman's suggestion, he himself had no objection to their having places on the floor, but he should object to their being sworn until a committee of the House had reported, or some action had been had on the question. His own opinion was that it ought to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. GRAVES had reference only to what had been the invariable practice heretofore. It had always been usual, in matters of this sort, that persons contending for seats there, had places assigned them on the floor, with leave to say whatever might be necessary in their own case. He therefore made a motion to that effect.

Mr. HAYNES said, neither did he himself, nor, he supposed, did any other member of the House, object to giving these gentlemen seats on the floor, for the purpose of hearing what was said, and of participating in the debates that might grow out of the question which their alleged return as members of that House might bring up. It had always been usual to extend that courtesy to persons claiming seats there. But, he believed, that if the journals of the House, touching any and every contested election, from the establishment of the present Government down to the present time, should be examined, it would be found that in no instance had such courtesy been extended to claimants for seats until after the reference to, and a report from, the Committee on Elections. He therefore considered the gentleman's (Mr. Graves) resolution as entirely premature. It would be reversing what Mr. H. believed to have been the uniform practice of the House in all similar cases. Surely, they must all recollect the course pursued by the House, two years ago, on the contested election from North Carolina. The claimant, in that instance, did not come within the hall, or participate in the discussions of the House, until after the report of the Committee of Elections was brought in. Why, what an interminable discussion might grow out of the adoption of the gentleman's motion. They would have nothing to act upon, nor could have, until the subject had been first referred to the proper organized committee of the House, and that committee had brought in its report upon it.

A single word or two to the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell.) Mr. H. could not, for the life of him, help being struck with the analogy the gentleman maintained to exist between the present case and that of the member from Arkansas. It forcibly reminded Mr. H. of the analogy between the course proposed by the gentleman, and that of the case of individuals, who had been already tried and acquitted, being called up again to receive judgment, because others had suffered judgment to go by default.

Mr. POPE was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from New York, as a general principle, but not in the present instance; on the contrary, he was utterly opposed to the commitment of this subject to the Committee of Elections, because they had, at the late session, given, at least a majority of the members composing the committee, a decision in favor of the sitting members. They had already prejudged the case. Moreover, this was not an ordinary case of a contested election, for there was no contest at all. It was a case sui generis, perhaps, without precedent, and could be decided without commitment. He would therefore make a proposition which should at once bring the whole question before House. It was in substance as follows:

Resolved, That Mr. Prentiss and Mr. Word be qualified to take their seats as members of this House for the present Congress, and that the resolution of the last session, in favor of Mr. CLAIBORNE and Mr. GHOLSON, be rescinded.

He asked, why commit this subject to a standing committee? Surely the constitutional and legal question could be met at once, and the House was fully competent to decide it. If, however, it was considered necessary to refer it to a committee at all, it ought to be referred to a select committee, and that committee ought to be composed of members favorable to the gentlemen claiming the seats; for he was at a loss to conceive with what propriety the House could send it to a committee, who had already declared those gentlemen were not entitled.

Mr. P. was understood to say that he had never heard of the Mississippi and Arkansas cases till some short time before he came on at the called session. A friend had then asked his opinion about the proclamation of the Governors of Mississippi and Arkansas; and Mr. P. had told him that he did not believe these Governors had any right to issue one for a special election. When, however, Mr. P. came to Washington, and took his seat, and an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Mercer) objected to Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson taking their seats, he (Mr. Pope) declined supporting the objection, on the ground, that if those gentlemen had not been admitted, the State of Mississippi would not have been represented on that floor. He thought it better, therefore, to waive the constitutional or legal right than to deprive the States of Mississippi and Arkansas (for the latter must have been included) of their voice here. This was the reason for the vote he then gave. Now the question assumed a totally different form. The question now is, whether that House should elect two members to represent Mississippi on that floor, or whether the people of Mississippi should elect their own members. He should, therefore, when in order, submit a resolution similar to the one he had indicated

Mr. GRAVES then modified his resolution, so as to read thus:

Resolved, That S. S. Prentiss, and T. J. Word, who claim their seats as members from the State of Mississippi, be admitted to seats on the floor of this hall, and, if they choose, have leave to participate in any debates that may grow out of it.

Mr. G. explained that his motion had no reference to, nor was intended to interfere with, Mr. CAMBRELENG'S motion. Mr. G's was a preliminary motion.

Mr. HAMER had but a few words to say on this subject at present. The gentlemen, who had presented their memorials, had not been introduced upon the floor and sworn as members, according to what he understood to be the intimation of the gentleman from Tennessee. There were already two members there from the State of Mississippi, occupying their seats in accordance with the decision of the House, and it would, indeed, be a strange anomaly to admit two more members, a double delegation, to take seats also. The latter could not possibly, at this stage, be admitted and qualified by the Speaker.

Mr. H. was also opposed to the proposition of the first gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Graves,) because he believed it to be both unusual and improper to admit those gentlemen on the floor until a report on the subject was made by a committee of the House.

What was the question then before them? It was the question, and that alone, what should be done with the memorial presented by the gentlemen claiming to be entitled to seats occupied by others. And that was a question to be determined by the House first, without hearing any argument that might be made for the object of the memorial. Why, they might reject it, or not receive it, or lay it, or the motion to receive it, on the table. They might serve it as they did the abolition memorials. Those gentlemen stood in the same predicament precisely as all other memorialists did—subject to the preliminary disposition of the memorial itself. Other memorialists were not allowed to come in upon the floor, and partake in debate on their memorials; and why should they? He should, therefore, vote against that proposition.

Mr. H. was in favor of referring this matter to the Committee of Elections, because he wanted to see a written argument, if these gentlemen chose to present one in support of their claim, and have it printed and laid upon the tables of the members. He wished also to see the constitution of Mississippi, or such parts of it as bore upon the case, printed. He desired also to see all the laws in relation to it printed and laid on their tables, together with every other document that could illustrate the case. This was the uniform practice of the House, and this was his reason for referring the subject to a committee. Let all these matters be reported upon, and laid upon the tables of the members, and time be given to consider them, and then, with great pleasure, he would vote to hear these gentlemen address the House in support of their claims.

One of the gentlemen from Kentucky, (Mr. Pope,) had remarked that the subject should not be sent to the Committee of Elections, because they had once made a decision in the case. Now Mr. H. took two exceptions to this argument: first, he denied that they had decided this case, for this claim had never been before them. It was true, they decided that the gentlemen who now occupy the seats were then entitled to them; but it might be that, upon a review of this case, upon an examination of all that might now be presented, they might decide the other way. There was, too, even then, a strong minority in the committee, who were of a different opinion, and they presented the other side of the question.

Secondly: if it be a reason that this subject should not be referred, as a preliminary step, to a committee, because a majority of the committee had once made a decision, surely it was equally a reason why the House itself was incompetent to decide it, because a majority of that House had once decided in favor of the sitting members. The one was as applicable as the other; and then it might as well be asked, why present the memorial at all? If the committee were incompetent, so was the House.

The gentleman furthermore informs us that the claims of these gentlemen for their seats must be sent, or ought to be sent, if sent at all, to a committee composed of members favorable to the claimants. Why, how was the Chair, or how was the House to ascertain that fact? Could either know the opinions of individual members? Why, even supposing the sitting members were to vacate their seats, who could at once say that the claimants had brought papers, certificates, and documents, to prove they were entitled to them? Could it be said that the House would, even in that case, take upon itself to decide without a reference to the committee having charge of the subject?

In conclusion, in every view which Mr. H. was able to take of this case, he was for sending the papers to the Committee of Elections, and let them take the usual course of all similar papers, viz: be printed, laid on the tables of the members, and then duly examined.

Mr. GRAVES had expressed no opinion, either in favor or against the claimants, nor even an opinion as to the propriety of reference. The latter was a point not necessary to be decided, or even discussed at that stage, in order to decide upon his proposition. The discussion of that question, however, only rendered the adoption of his resolution the more requisite as a preliminary step; for he held it to be proper that the claimants should be heard on the motion of reference if they wished it.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, in reply to the member from Ohio, Mr. HAMER, contended that the gentlemen now claiming their seats were not placed in the same situation as other memoralists, who never had their memorials referred to the judges, who had voted against them. In his opinion, as a simple matter of justice, the claimants had a right to seats on the floor, in order to meet and answer any arguments in the House against them, and coming from an interested source, and to trace them to their foundation. The subject was one of paramount importance, affecting the representation of the nation; and therefore it was imperative on the House to give every opportunity of investigating the charges before it, and of probing the matter to the bottom. The member from Ohio had referred to the decision of the Committee of Elections at the late special session; but he would ask him on what did that committee decide? They had reported on the warrant of the Governor, which called upon the people of the State of Mississippi to vote for the election of representatives to serve until the period arrived for the regular annual elections. Yet, in the face of that and other facts, they had made a report which declared that Messrs Claiborne and Gholson, representatives from the State of Mississippi, had been duly elected to serve for the whole of the twenty-fifth Congress. He was therefore averse to the reference of the subject again to that committee, as it would place them in an unpleasant position, and compel them either to fortify their former decision, or to revoke it entirely. He considered that a reference to any other committee would answer the purpose equally as well, as all they had to do was simply to ascertain the facts. But to refer the subject a second time to the Committee of Elections would be of no utility, as they had already examined the facts, and reported thereon.

Mr. W. THOMPSON thought that, as a matter of abstract right, the gentlemen from Mississippi ought to be admitted on the floor. He did not know whether those gentlemen desired a reference of the subject, or not; but he would like to hear them, and would have liked to have heard them at the last session, before he gave his vote on the subject. But still he was in favor of a reference of the matter to a committee.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said that, so far as he was personally concerned, so far as his wishes on this subject could influence the action of his friends, he hoped that all opposition to the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Graves) would be withdrawn. When the question was in abeyance at the extra session, relative to the right of his colleague and himself to their seats, although we did not participate in the debate here, we appeared before the Committee of Elections, and submitted an argument in support of our claims. The gentlemen from Mississippi (Messrs. Prentiss and Word) appear here with their certificates of election, and ask to be heard. I hope that they will be. I wish them to have an opportunity of submitting any statement of fact, any argument, any appeal, they may think proper. If the proposition was to qualify these gentlemen I should object decidedly; for I could never so far surrender my rights here. Sir, what are the facts? My colleague and myself were elected in July last; we claimed our seats; an honorable member from Virginia objected; the objection was overruled; and after the usual process of investigation, this House decided that we were members for the entire twenty-fifth Congress; we did not submit our names again as candidates; we considered the question as adjudicated, finally decided; that there could be no appeal, and so thought our political friends in Mississippi. A majority of them refused to attend the polls. But, sir, the gentlemen at the bar think otherwise; their political friends think otherwise; they were voted for; they conducted the canvass with great fairness and liberality; and I should do injustice to my own feelings to oppose any wish they may entertain to appear, at this stage of the proceeding, before the House.

Mr. TAYLOR thought there could not be the slightest objection to the gentlemen from Mississippi occupying seats in the House, as a matter of courtesy, until the case should have been finally decided; but he could not agree to their being allowed to take their seats, with a view of discussing the merits of the question before the House.

Mr. REED thought it was nothing more than fair to presume that the people of Mississippi had in fact elected four representatives. At the late special session, it was true that the House had declared the two present members as elected for the whole Congress; but was not the voice of the people to be regarded? The people of Mississippi had now sent two representatives, and their voice ought to be regarded. He thought the claimants, under those circumstances, were entitled to take their seats, in order to discuss the question. They were sent by the people, and they had a right to be heard. They came with their certificates from the people; and whether they had been legally elected or not, the people of Mississippi thought so. He applauded the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, (Mr. Claiborne,) one of the present members; for even he had expressed his respect for the opinions of the people. He (Mr. R.) saw no reason why the gentlemen should not be permitted to take their seats.

Mr. BOON agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the voice of the people of Mississippi ought to be respected. But he would ask that gentleman, if their voice had not been already heard? He would ask, if it had not been heard during the recent session, when the present subject was fully discussed and deliberated upon by the House? The fact was, the people of Mississippi could have but two representatives, and those two men the present members who had been previously elected, and whose election had been confirmed by the House for the whole Congress; and how, he would ask, could two more be admitted, without the expulsion of those gentlemen.

Mr. BELL regretted to see that, from a mere preliminary question of reference, the discussion had branched out into the merits of the subject. But only one side of the question had been stated. Under those circumstances, he thought it his duty to give the opposite side of the question. That opposite side was, that there had been no decision of the House where the people of Mississippi had been heard. They had not been heard on the question neither by agents nor counsel; nor by any one to represent them. On one side the proceedings were wholly ex parte. In no proper and just sense had the case been adjudicated. It was denied that the people of Mississippi had been heard in the decision of the House. Here was the issue. It was also denied that the decision was made in accordance with the Constitution and the laws of the land.

He (Mr. B.) was in favor of the gentlemen being permitted to take their seats on the floor; and he believed such a privilege had never been denied on any occasion. From the nature of the present case, it appeared to him that there was no necessity that the subject should be referred to a committee at all; but if it appeared that the majority of the House was in favor of such a reference, he would not be tenacious about it.

Mr. FOSTER referred to the decision of the House at the last session. Two questions had then arisen: first, whether Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson had been legally elected; and, secondly, whether they had been elected for the whole twenty-fifth Congress. Both those questions had been adjudicated and decided by the House, after a full and deliberate discussion. It had just been said that the proceedings on that occasion were ex parte Such was not the case: he denied it. The matter had been adjudicated by the House in accordance with the provision of the Constitution which provided that, in all cases of contested elections, not that the House might, but that it should determine, etc

Mr. EVERETT rose to a point of order; he contended that the gentleman from New York had no right to discuss the merits of the main question, the subject before them being merely one of reference.

The SPEAKER ruled that Mr. F. was in order.

Mr. F. resumed, and continued his argument in opposition to the claimants being permitted to take their seats; inasmuch as the present members had been declared by the House to have been elected for the whole term, and that the delegation from Mississippi was of course full and complete. If all four of them had presented themselves previously to the decision of the House, then there could have been no objection to the proposition; but as the decision had been made, there was not the slightest ground for the resolution to be entertained. He had no objection to their taking seats by courtesy, but he had a decided objection to their being allowed to participate in a debate with members who were duly qualified in all respects. He begged gentlemen to consider well before they entertained a proposition admitting persons who were not members to come and give their views to the House, and reply to those of others. He thought the only true course was to refer the matter to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. EVERETT had no objection to the subject being referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to report thereon; but when the merits of the case came up before the House, he considered the petitioners ought to be permitted to take their seats on the floor. He was opposed to any discussion on the merits of the question before such reference.

After a few remarks from Messrs. GRAVES and YELL,

Mr. CAMBRELENG considered the course of the gentleman from Kentucky as entirely objectionable, and sent to the Clerk to be read a resolution formerly adopted in the case of Mr. Newland, when that person was permitted to address the House in support of his claims, after a report from the committee.

Mr. LEGARE was opposed to any course which should give the claimants the privilege of a seat on the floor. He considered it contrary to all parliamentary usage to allow individuals to take their seats for the purpose of discussing the merits of a contested election after the matter had been solemnly adjudicated by the House.

Mr. BRIGGS considered the gentlemen had a right to be heard, as had any one who had a claim to a seat on the floor.

Mr. THOMPSON made some brief remarks.

Mr. CLOWNEY said he was satisfied that the proper course was to refer the subject to a committee, and therefore moved to lay Mr. GRAVES's resolution on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 90, nays 87.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

The question then recurring on Mr. CAMBRELENG's motion to commit the subject to the Committee of Elections,

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky said he would make a motion which would bring the House to a direct vote on the question, and dispose of it at once He, therefore, moved a resolution that Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress from the State of Mississippi.

The CHAIR decided that the motion of that time was not in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then moved to commit the subject to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which motion taking precedence,

Mr. EVERETT moved to instruct the committee to report to the House on all the facts of the case.

Mr. BOON remarking that such a motion was entirely without precedent, in all former cases of this kind, from the origin of the Government to the present time, moved to lay it on the table.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that his motion would cohere to the whole subject, and thereby lay the whole on the table; whereupon,

Mr. BOON withdrew his motion.

Mr. YELL then suggested to Mr. UNDERWOOD that he had better not press his motion, unless he made the subject the special order for to-morrow; inasmuch, in Commitee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it might not be reached for a month or more to come.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, agreeably to Mr. BELL's suggestion, withdrew his motion; and the question again recurring on referring the subject to the Committee of Elections,

Mr. EVERETT renewed his instructions to that committee, which were agreed to; and the motion of reference being also agreed to, as amended, the subject was referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing his opinion, called for by the resolution of the House, as to the expediency of establishing a navy yard for sloops of war at Charleston, South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, December 28, 1837.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of the northwestern section of Ohio, praying for the sale of certain alternate sections of public lands, and that the proceeds, over and above the Government price, may be devoted to the purposes of internal improvement in that State.

Mr. NILES introduced a bill providing for the erection of a monument to the memory of Captain Nathan Hale: read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TIPTON introduced a bill for the relief of Michael Cassady: read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill to provide for the final settlement of the claims of States upon the United States, for interest on payments or advances made during the war: read, and referred.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of the Union Bank of Georgetown, to be reimbursed for money lost at the Baltimore post office, through the admission of an improper person by the postmaster: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. LYON introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Campbell: read, and referred to the Committee on Private Claims.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Alabama, praying alteration of a mail route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLAS, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the expediency of confirming by law the surveys in the southeastern district of Louisiana.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER,

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals inquire the expediency of making further appropriation for opening Red river raft.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill for the relief of Wm. H. Robinson and others: read, and ordered to a second reading.

The consideration of the resolutions requesting the opinion of the Postmaster General, &c. was resumed, and Mr. NILES offered a substitute for that resolution, requiring the Postmaster General to communicate to the Senate his opinion of the propriety and advantages of authorizing by law the transmission in the mail of sums of money, not exceeding severally a certain amount, at the risk of the Department; the rate per centage which ought to be charged by the Department for that risk; and such other information on the subject as he might think, and within his power.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky was desirous of knowing if there was on record any precedent for a requisition from the Senate upon one of the heads of departments for an opinion simply upon any subject before that body. Sir, we had frequent examples of a call being made upon these officers for information on subjects relative to their special departments. He would instance the Secretary of the Treasury, who was often required to attend in person upon the Committee on Finance to give information requisite. If the Senate establish this as a rule, requiring the simple opinions, it might as well adopt the English parliamentary style, and invite the whole cabinet to take seats in joint committee on the floor. If the Postmaster General be required to give his opinion, it surely was but right that he appear in committee and defend it. He would not object to receiving information from this quarter, but could never consent to a consultation of opinions. He therefore expressed his hope that the resolution, in its present shape, would not be adopted.

Mr. NILES should have no objection to modifying the resolutions to meet the views of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. C.); but he considered them as they stood, as presenting precisely the same general view. He admitted the impropriety of asking on any occasion the opinion of individuals; but he considered the present instance as a simple requisition for information. This course would apply with equal force to either branch of Congress. The present he considered an inquiry of importance to the whole country, though not in a shape requiring details on the subject. It was a matter of doubt whether, if adopted, this mode of obtaining information would not be preferable to that of introducing bills on many important subjects. Such information was more direct and explicit, and better calculated for the purposes of legislation.

As an instance of the advantage of the proposed measure, which would render money throughout the country local in itself, and of equal value, he adverted to the publication of, and subscription for, newspapers. It was for the more convenient manner of transacting the minor descriptions of business he wished to effect. He would not constitute the department agents for the transaction of business of heavy amount. It would clothe it with a power he did not intend or think proper.

Mr. CLAY would not give his opinion of the utility of the proposed measure. It was only the manner of effecting the object that met with his objection. He would vote for the proposed inquiry if the honorable Senator (Mr. Niles) would so amend it as to require information instead of opinions. If the adoption of the resolutions was urged in the present form, he should ask the yeas and nays, to see how far it was the voice of the Senate to call in the heads of departments to assist in the usual routine of legislation

Mr. GRUNDY would oppose the resolution in any form. He was opposed to the proposition which might ultimately result from the adoption of the principal features; and moreover, he had never yet known, nor did he wish to know, of the Senate having asked an opinion from a head of a department. It is part of the duty of these officers to give all requisite information when called upon, and this was all-sufficient for the purposes of the Senate. He had no idea of taking into the Senate twelve thousand advisers. This would be the result of the precedent they were about to establish. It was virtually asking advice of the twelve thousand postmasters of the Union. Nor did the public good require the appointment of twelve thousand additional fiscal agents. This would be the result of the measure if carried out. Newspapers, and other matters of the kind, might bear their own responsibility, as they were wont to do now. The provisions of the resolution would establish every little petty postmaster of the wild woods a public insurer for a trifling sum of five dollars, if sent by mail. It was a novel and trivial measure, stamped as such upon its very face; and he hoped never to be called upon to vote either for or against it.

Mr. NILES was sorry that the honorable Senator from Tennessee (Mr. Grundy) was so much in fear of the resolution as to dread its very touch, or even afford it a look. He, however, was not particularly urgent on the subject at this time, and was willing to see the sense of the Senate expressed thereon.

On motion, the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. NORVELL rose and remarked that at a previous day, on the occasion of the presentation of the Vermont resolutions, he had given notice that he had prepared a series of resolutions on the subject of abolition, which circumstances had prevented his offering till the present moment.

Mr. N. then presented the following:

Resolved, That the Government of the United States is a National Government only for the general purposes specified in the Federal Constitution.

That the States of this Union, in all their reserved rights and powers, are separate, independent, and sovereign political communities.

That any interference by one or more States, or by the people of one or more States, with the domestic institutions of any other State of this Union, or with any of its reserved rights and powers over those institutions, is a palpable and dangerous infraction of the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, tending directly to disturb the peace and tranquillity of the Union, and to sever the links which connect us together as one people.

That the Senate of the United States, composed of the representatives of the States in their sovereign capacities, and bound to protect the reserved rights and powers left to them in the compact of Union, would regard any attempt, on the part of the Federal Government, under the pretext of regulating commerce among the several States, or under any other pretext whatever, to prohibit the domestic trade between any of the States, or the citizens of any of the States, allowed by them in any kind of property, recognised as such by their laws, as unconstitutional in spirit and in letter: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States will neither receive, nor entertain, any petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper, praying Congress to prohibit any such trade.

Resolved, That, as it would be a breach of the public faith of the nation to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, without the consent of the people of the District, the Senate will neither receive, nor entertain, any petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper, praying for the adoption of such measures, unless it proceed from the people of the District of Columbia.

The resolutions being read, they were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CALHOUN said, in calling up these resolutions, it was not his intention, at the present time, to enter into any discussion of their merits or demerits, but merely to repel such objections as might be urged against them. The resolutions spoke definitely, and to all points, for themselves. This confederacy consisted of free, sovereign, and independent States, each vested with supreme and indisputable rights! Some there were, however, who considered this a great National Republic, made up of individuals, with rights common to all; of this class might be deemed the party termed Abolitionists, in the North. It was the object of these resolutions to bring forward the facts, and display them in their true light. He wished the deep deliberation of every Senator, as he desired to make the question, on their rejection or adoption, a test question. All present, every Senator, without exception, had confessed himself opposed to the fanatical doctrine of abolition; yet the South had no rallying point on which to stand; and, although their measures were justified by a great portion of the North, yet there was among them another party, zealots in the cause of Abolition, chiming aloud under the sacred right of petition. Many, doubtless, were drawn into that snare, who, in the first instance, were conservative in their views. Whatever might be the diversity of opinion, of this great country, on other points, on the matter now at issue no one could disagree. These resolutions, if adopted, would present ground where all could stand, and express their real opinions without trenching on or affecting the rights on other points. With regard to the right of slavery, his opinion was unalterable, and he held it an insult to have his rights attacked on the question. He hoped the Senate would take sufficient time to discuss calmly the subject, and that each Senator would express his individual opinion.

He did not desire them to pass by a bare majority; he wished them to pass by a unanimous vote; be that as it might, however, he would repeat what he had before said, that he wished it to be considered a test question. If these propositions were rejected, the Senate will have said to the South "come here no longer for protection;" by such a vote the Senate would legalize a continuance of these assaults. If, on the contrary, they were adopted, it would be a holy pledge of that body to protect it from further aggression; but if postponed or eluded, it would be incontrovertible evidence of the unwillingness of the Senate to express an opinion; and consequently must be considered a silent acquiescence in the insults offered to Southern rights and Southern feelings. If adopted, they would have a salutary effect in tranquillizing the public mind. He looked to these resolutions to create an awakening spirit in the country in favor of the Constitution. The idea that this Republic was made up of one great aggregate of individuals, tended to increase the zeal of these fanatics, and a more rapid spread of their doctrines. The remedy must be found in the promulgation of opposite doctrines; and until this course was adopted, we could look for nothing but a continuance of their importunities. When the Republic was in danger, he must look to State rights, (the only true conservative principles,) and on this depended the preservation of the Union; and any other view must prove fatal to its peace.

The cause before the Senate he (Mr. C.) considered of great magnitude and importance, and hence he did not desire to urge on its progress; and if there was no other motion desired to be made by any Senator, he would move to postpone it to Wednesday next, with the understanding that the Vermont resolutions were not to be presented until a later period; he was anxious for a calm and deliberate expression from the Senate, before the question arose in the opposite shape, in which it had already been so angrily discussed.

Mr. PRESTON spoke for some time in answer to Mr. CALHOUN. He had not as yet had time to consider the resolutions; he had seen them for the first time in the Globe of this morning. Mr. P. confessed himself of opinion that it was now too late to reach the extent of the evil by the presentment of mere abstract questions. Mr. P. wished to heaven they might have such an effect; but he had looked too long at the growing extent of the evil of abolition to suppose it could be put down in any other way than by the South presenting one firm, unbroken phalanx.

Mr. CALHOUN replied to Mr. PRESTON, and said that the object he had in view was to test the state of feeling in the Senate to the extent of the limits proposed in the resolutions. He (Mr. C.) had already stated that his own mind had long since been fixed; he had long seen, and still feared, that the South must find the remedy within herself. He had also stated that the resolutions presented common ground. He would not be understood, however, as establishing a ground on which to meet the Abolitionists. It was that on which the opposers of the doctrine could meet. He, for one, and he hoped he had a ready response in the bosom of every Southern man, would no longer meet in argument fanatics that would violate any moral and political principle to obtain their ends. It was the test ground on which to decide in what manner the South was to assert her rights.

Mr. PRESTON made a short reply to Mr. Calhoun. His objections to the introduction of the resolutions was, that they allowed ground for discussion; and that the subject ought never to be allowed to enter the halls of the Legislative Assembly, was always to be taken for granted by the South. Again: what would abstract propositions of this nature effect? He had them in the decalogue, but did they prevent crime?

Mr. STRANGE said that no measure could be considered child's play when wives, children, property, all that was dear to man, was at stake. Could he be otherwise than excited (said Mr. S.) when this subject is brought on the tapis. He felt sorry that the resolutions had been introduced; it was true he had been consulted, but his mind had not yielded assent, because he was of opinion that the South always lost ground by discussion, and he wished to avoid it from the very bottom of his soul. When a memorial had been presented from the Grand Jury of this District, praying that slavery might not be abolished in the District of Columbia, he had voted against the printing of that memorial, simply because he did not wish the question to go before the world. If the North sets us the example of excitement, why did we follow it? So far as he was concerned, he agreed with the whole spirit of the resolutions, but still did not think them sufficient to meet the exigency of the case. He was opposed to their postponement, because it would result in a long and protracted discussion, in which the South could not fail to be the sufferer. Let whatever action be had upon them, on this question, as in all others of magnitude, the greatest good must result from the most speedy action. A postponement, though definite, would be actually, in the views of our opponents, equal to an indefinite one, and was just so much grounded yielded to the Abolitionists. What good (asked Mr. S.) would result, if the resolutions were ultimately adopted? Come when they would, he should give them his cordial support.

What did they set forth but abstract principles, to which the South had again and again certified? What bulwark of defence was needed stronger than the Constitution itself? Every movement on the part of the South only gave additional strength to her opponents. The wisest, nay, her only safe course, was to remain quiet, though prepared, at the same time, to resist all aggression. The question was not, in his mind, a sectional one; but rather one in which the interests of the whole country were alike involved—the North, the South, the East, the West. Questions like this only tended to excite angry feelings. He had no doubt a large majority of the North had not their heads addled with this spirit of fanaticism, and by indulging too strongly in sectional feeling, we might array the pure and good of that portion of the country against us. Violent excitements of any kind were to be deplored. All past history show their danger. Why, then, should we seek to set the ball in motion by these angry and exciting discussions? We of the South should not be the first to assume a hostile position, but be ever prepared to meet danger, come when it might, with a firm and manly front. Would it be wise to attempt to still the waves of the ocean by rushing against them? None but a maniac would do it. Why, then should we attempt it?

The current of fanaticism which has crossed the Atlantic, (said Mr. S.) has, we but too plainly see, swept away in its course one of our sovereign States; and how many more were doomed to follow, God only knew. Our forefathers saw the danger to which we were subject, and provided against it when they established the Constitution, behind which we could entrench ourselves, and be safe. What need have we of any thing more than this sacred compact which I hold in my hand—the Constitution?

Mr. S. said the greatest objection he had to the resolutions, was the danger of producing mischief by the discussion—mischief by the excitement that must necessarily be created in dipping into these disquieting topics. The proper course for the South, was, as he had before observed, was to remain still, and pay no attention to the movements of these idle fanatics. When these Abolition movements came from a higher source, he would point to the Constitution, and that under that instrument our possessions are guarantied. Vermont he thought had degraded herself by the adoption of the resolutions, (which on a former occasion, had been read in the Senate,) and by the presentation of them to this body, had forfeited her claims to respect. He was willing to believe that a majority of her citizens were opposed to their adoption, and that by some fatuitous circumstances, her Legislature had become momentarily filled with abolitionists! He hoped for her everlasting credit, that the result of her earliest deliberations, would be to retrace her steps, and retract the odious document directed to be presented. Mr. S. concluded, by observing that he was decidedly in favor of voting against the reception of all petitions, memorials, or resolutions, (come from whatever quarter they might,) in relation to the subject of slavery.

Mr. SWIFT said he had observed, as well during the present as at previous discussions, that unpleasant allusions had been made to the resolutions which he had offered, and improper reflections passed upon the State of Vermont. He trusted gentlemen would forbear any further allusions, either to the documents or the State from which they emanated, during the present discussion, and which was manifestly on a different subject. He thought it would be time enough when the memorial from his State should be brought before the Senate, which, in accordance with a notice he had previously given, he should do at an early date

Mr. CALHOUN said the Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. Strange,) was averse to the discussion of this subject; so was every one else; but he ought to preach that to the abolitionists, not to the defenders of the sovereignty of the States. Was it not better to meet the quesiion a little offensively than not to meet it at all? With regard to the doctrines of the Constitution, all might be well acquainted with them; and yet how were they observed? Was the South to sit still and see the Constitution trodden under foot, and its principles assailed? Would it not be better to try and rally around that body all who were orthodox in their political adherence? Look to the alien and sedition law. Was that odious measure defeated by sitting still, and quoung the authority of the Constitution? Was it not rather by a series of brief, summary, and abstract resolutions? By that straight-forward, manly course we would protect our own rights, and at the same time show that it was our aim to defend to the last the charter handed down to us by our forefathers. He wished these resolutions by no means to be considered as strictly a southern measure. He hoped that the vote that would be given upon them, would be a northern and western, as well as southern vote, and he appealed to the honorable Senator whether a strong vote would not tend to restore, throughout the Union, that confidence so much to be desired, and whether it would not also have a tendency to avert this fatal tide of fanaticism?

Mr. STRANGE said that he had already pledged himself to give the resolutions his cordial support, come up when they would. The Senator from South Carolina charged him with preaching to one side. Perhaps he had sermonised too long for the patience of the Senate; but then he had preached to all sides. It was the agitation of the question, in any form or shape, that rendered it dangerous. The Senator was pleased to quote the alien and sedition law; but in his (Mr. S's) opinion, there was no analogy: there were certain truths about which it might be dangerous to reason. Why address a packed jury, or reason with a madman? Of all species of madness, there was none more dangerous than the madness of fanaticism. To reason, then, with those creatures, was to cast pearls before swine. The arguments used by all parties would go forth, and act differently on different minds; and we all know the anxiety that is manifested by a certain set to hear what is going on in relation to this matter. Agitating this question in any shape was ruinous to the South. It was like that game played on the unfortunate wight: "heads I win, tails you lose." If we succeed, by our discussions, in convincing our Northern brethren, what becomes of our homes after the poison has reached that quarter. He repeated, that it would have an incalculably mischievous effect; that we had every thing to lose, and nothing to gain.

The question was then taken on the postponement to Wednesday next, and carried.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Y. Keene; the bill for the relief of J. McCrarey; the bill for the relief of the heirs of H. Morfit, deceased; were severally read a third time and passed.

The bill authorizing the States to tax public lands, sold within their respective limits, was read a third time and passed.

The bill authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth section, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof, was taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Daniel Bush was then taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of John Newton was taken up, and, after being discussed at some length, was finally laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, Dec. 28, 1837.

Mr. BRIGGS, on leave, submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying to J. C. Noys, a member of this House, two hundred and fifty dollars, being the amount of three Treasury notes, which he received from the Sergeant-at-arms, and which were accidentally destroyed by fire.

After some remarks from Messrs. WHITTLESEY and ADAMS,

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia moved to amend the resolution, by striking out "Committee on Accounts," and inserting "Committee of Claims."

Some further observations were made by Messrs. GARLAND, BRIGGS, HASTINGS, REED, and HAMER; when the question was taken on the proposed amendment, and rejected.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was agreed to.

Mr. BOON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported the following two bills, the first of which was accompanied by the report herewith subjoined:

A BILL to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands subject to private entry.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the 30th day of June, 1838, all the public lands of the United States which remain unsold after having been offered at private sale at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, for five years, shall be subject to entry at one dollar per acre; and all those which shall have been so offered for ten years, shall be subject to entry, at seventy-five cents per acre; and all those which shall have been so offered for fifteen years, shall be subject to entry at fifty cents per acre; and all those which shall have been so offered for twenty years shall be subject to entry at twenty-five cents per acre.

The Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, and sundry petitions and memorials on the subject of a reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands, and granting preemption rights to actual settlers, report:

That they have carefully bestowed upon the subjects referred to them that consideration which the importance of those measures seemed to require.

Previous to the formation of the Federal Constitution, it was recommended by Congress that a portion of the waste lands owned by the States should be ceded to the United States, for the purpose of raising a fund to meet the expenses growing out of the war of the Revolution. This recommendation was adopted, and, at different periods of time, the States of Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, ceded to the United States a portion of their vacant lands for the object above stated.

The first policy adopted by the General Government, in the management and sale of the lands thus acquired, was to offer them to purchasers at public sale, to the highest bidder, and such of them as would not sell for a price exceeding two dollars per acre, were afterwards subject to entry at two dollars per acre; one-fourth of the purchase money being required in advance, and the other three-fourths being required in three equal instalments, of two, four, and six years, from the date of any such purchase or entry of any of the public lands. Under this system, competition in the purchase of lands between individual purchasers at public sales, in some of the districts, became so great that in many instances lands were run up to seventy-five, and in some instances to over one hundred dollars per acre. Shortly after these high sales and purchase of the public lands, a sudden revulsion took place in the price of produce and property of every description, by reason of which, many of the purchasers of those lands became involved in a debt to the Government which they were unable to pay; consequently, a considerable portion of the lands thus purchased, became forfeited to the Government for non-payment of the purchase money.

Under this state of affairs, it was perceived that the purchasers of those lands and the Government would be brought into unpleasant collisions; to avert which, Congress passed a law in the year 1820, to reduce the price of the public lands to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and requiring cash payment therefor, and providing that those persons who had purchased lands under the credit system, or became the legal holders of certificates of purchase as aforesaid, should be permitted to relinquish to the Government the certificates of purchase of those on which full payment had not been made, and to apply the part so relinquished in completing payments for other lands by them retained.

From the 30th June, 1820, it has been the policy of the Government to sell her lands to purchasers at private entry, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, after their having been offered to the public for sale to the highest bidder at public vendue. Since the adoption of the present land system, various schemes have been proposed in regard to their future disposal; but no one of the schemes that have been proposed to change or alter the present system, has received the approbation of Congress. The extinguishment of the national debt having been finally accomplished, and the public lands being no longer needed as a source of revenue to the General Government, it would be an act of the greatest possible injustice toward the new States to tax the people of those States in the purchase of the public lands, merely for the purpose of raising a surplus revenue, to be distributed among the several States; a project certainly never contemplated by the several compacts between the States and the General Government, by which these lands became the common property of all the States of the Union.

Previous to the final extinguishment of the national debt, the revenue which accrued to the general Government from the sales of the public lands, and that which was received from duties imposed upon foreign merchandise, was held and used by the Government as a fund to "pay the debts and to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." It does not seem, therefore, that any good reason can now be given in favor of separating these two great sources of public revenue to the Government. A graduation and reduction in the price of the public lands has long been a subject of the greatest possible solicitude with the people of the new States, as may be seen by reference to the various and numerous petitions, memorials, and Legislative resolutions, which have, from time to time, been presented, and pressed upon the consideration of Congress.

The committee are of opinion that Congress does not possess the constitutional power to lay and collect taxes merely for the purpose of raising a fund to be distributed among the several States of the Union, nor for any other purpose whatever, except to pay the debts and to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.

When the money of the people shall have been drawn from their pockets by any system of taxation whatever, it would be impossible for the wisdom of man to devise any plan by which the same would be returned to each individual from whom it shall or may have been collected, in the same ratio in which it shall have been drawn from their pockets. It would be unjust, therefore, to tax the many for the purpose of benefiting the few. Upon the most liberal view of the subject, the committee are of opinion that the period has fully arrived when the public lands should cease to be a source of revenue to the Government, except for the payment of those general charges which grow out of the acquisition of the lands, their survey, and their sale.

In some of the land districts, there remains only the refuse lands, some of which have been subject to private entry for a period of from thirty to forty years; and it is not to be supposed that those lands will be purchased at the present price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for many years yet to come, if ever. If the lands which remain unsold, after having become subject to sale at private entry, for a period of five years and upwards, were graduated and reduced in price, the consequence would be that, while the Government would be no loser by such a policy, many an honest poor man would thereby be enabled to procure a home that he could call his own; and the States in which the public lands are situated, would be earlier possessed of additional sources of revenue, to the States respectively; and the still more important advantage to those States, would be cultivated fields and green meadows, in the place of an unproductive forest.

It is a fact well established, that the wealth and strength of the country are its population, and the better portion are the cultivators of the soil; and while the burdens of the South and East are diminishing by the reduction of the duties on the luxuries of life, it seems but equal justice that the chief burdens of the West should be lightened at least in an equal degree.

The immense value that has been given to a vast portion of the public domain, which was acquired first by conquest, and afterwards by purchase, has been mainly produced by the dauntless courage and unspeakable sufferings of the hardy adventurous sons of the West. But for the many privations in life which were encountered by the early pioneers of the western wilds, the whole fertile region of country west of the Alleghany mountains, would, until the present day, have remained an unproductive forest, inhabited only by savages and beasts of prey. It is a fact worthy of the most serious consideration, that although the people of the new States of the West, are separated from the old thirteen States, by mere geographical divisions and boundary lines, they are nevertheless brethren and fellow kinsmen, having one and the same great common interest to support and sustain, by strengthening those cords which bind together our glorious Union.

In concluding this report, the committee cannot better express their views, in reference to the subject which has been referred to them, than by adding one or two extracts from President Jackson's annual message to the two Houses of Congress in 1835, in which he says: "It seems to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, and that they be sold to settlers in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts. The advantages of accurate surveys and undoubted titles, now secured to purchasers, seem to forbid the abolition of the present system, because none can be substituted which will more perfectly accomplish these important ends. It is desirable, however, that, in convenient time, this machinery be withdrawn from the States respectively in which it lies."

"The adventurous and hardy population of the West, besides contributing their equal share of taxation under our impost system, have, in the progress of our Government, for the lands they occupy, paid into the Treasury a large portion of forty millions of dollars; and of the revenue received therefrom, but a small part has been expended amongst them. When to the disadvantages of their situation in this respect, we add the consideration that it is their labor which gives real value to the lands, and that the proceeds arising from their sale are distributed chiefly among States which had not originally any claim to them, and which have enjoyed the undivided emolument arising from the sale of their own lands, it cannot be expected that the new States will remain longer contented with the present policy, after the payment of the public debt. To avert the consequences which may be apprehended from this cause and to put an end for ever to all partial and interested legislation on this subject, and to afford to every American citizen of enterprise, the opportunity of securing an independent freehold; it seems to me therefore, best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands." Again, the present Chief Magistrate in his late annual Message to Congress, takes the following view of the same subject. He says—"A large portion of our citizens have seated themselves on the public lands without authority, since the passage of the last pre-emption law, and now ask the enactment of another to enable them to retain the lands occupied, upon payment of the minimum Government price. They ask that which has been repeatedly granted before. If the future may be judged of by the past, little harm can be done to the interests of the Treasury by yielding to their request. Upon a critical examination, it is found that the lands sold at the public sales since the introduction of cash payments in 1820, have produced, on an average, the nett revenue only of six per cent. an acre more than the minimum Government price, and there is no reason to suppose that future sales will be more productive.

The Government, therefore, has no adequate pecuniary interest to induce it to drive these people from the lands they occupy, for the purpose of selling them to others. Entertaining these views, I recommend the passage of a pre-emption law for their benefit, in connection with the preparatory steps towards the graduation of the price of the public lands, and further and more effectual provisions to prevent intrusions hereafter. Indulgence to those who have settled on these lands with expectations that past legislation would be made a rule for the future, and at the same time removing the most plausible ground on which intrusions are excused, and adopting more efficient means to prevent them hereafter, appear to me the most judicious disposition which can be made of this difficult subject. The limitations and restrictions against the abuses in the execution of a pre-emption law, will necessarily attract the careful attention of Congress; but under no circumstances is it expedient to authorize floating claims in any shape. They have been heretofore, and doubtles would be hereafter, most prolific sources of fraud." In these views of the subject, the committee fully concur, believing it to be the true policy of the Government as well as just to its citizens, so to regulate the price of the public domain, as to enable every poor man to procure a home which he can call his own. Such a policy would not be alone confined to the people of the new States. Its benefits would be equally open to every citizen of all the States. It is due to the new States that a liberal policy should be adopted in the sale of the public lands within their respective limits, with a view to promote their early settlement and improvement.

In some of the new States, where the public lands have been in market upwards of thirty-five years, there is yet remaining large tracts of unsold refuse lands, which will not sell for the present minimum Government price, by reason of which, the settlement and improvement of those States have been greatly retarded, and the States and the General Government, respectively, have been thereby considerably curtailed in their revenues, which would have accrued to both from an early sale and settlement, and consequent cultivation of those lands.

Under any and every view of the subject in which it presents itself for consideration, whether as relates to the interest of the General Government, or to that of the States in which the public lands are situated, the committee are of opinion that he mutual interest of both requires that the public lands should be reduced in price, at a rate proportioned to the length of time they shall have been brought into market and subject to sale at private entry, and that the present settlers on the public lands ought to be secured in their settlement by pre-emption rights.

The committee reports bills accordingly.

A BILL to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every actual settler of the public lands, who was in possession on or before the first day of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, and cultivated any part thereof in said year, shall be entitled to all the benefits and privileges of an act entitled "An act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved May twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and thirty; and the said act is hereby revived and continued in force two years: Provided, That where more than one person may have settled upon and cultivated any part of one quarter section of land, each one of them shall have an equal share or interest in said quarter section, but shall have no claim, by virtue of this act, to any other land: And provided, always, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to any land to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, or to any specially occupied or reserved for town lots, or other purposes, by authority of the United States: And provided, further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to effect any of the selections of public lands for the purpose of education, the use of salt springs, or for any other purpose, which may have been or may be made by any State, under existing laws of the United States.

MEXICO.

The next business in order was on the reference of a memorial presented by Mr. ADAMS on Monday week, from the New York Peace Society, and other individuals friendly to the peace cause, praying Congress to accede to the proposition of the Mexican Congress.

[This proposition was couched in the followed terms, contained in a decree of that Congress, dated May 20, 1837, viz:

"The Government is hereby authorized to compromise the claims which the Government of the United States has instituted, or may hereafter institute; and these in which they cannot agree, may be submitted to the decision of a friendly Power, the United States of America agreeing thereto."]

The question pending was on referring the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion pending being on referring said memorial to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HOWARD, from a sense of duty which he owed to the House and to himself, would ask indulgence for a few moments, while he made some brief remarks in relation to the subject then before them.

It would be recollected that when the question was last before the House, he had stated, that "he had taken some pains to inquire from the proper authorities, but found that no proposition had been presented from the Mexican Government of the nature of the one alluded to in the petition."

When the proposition had come before the House, a few days ago, a sketch of the proceedings, together with the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and a few briet remarks of his own, appeared the next day in one of the daily papers of the city, and the proceedings were afterwards commented on by another daily paper. He considered it his duty to be particularly careful to make himself understood, and to express himself in such a manner as would guard against misconstruction. With that view he felt himself bound to say, that when he made that statement he believed it to be literally correct; but since that time it had become otherwise; and lest it should hereafter appear that he had suffered the statement to remain uncontradicted, he felt it incumbent upon him to say, that a communication bearing date of the 23d instant, at Philadelphia, had been received by the Department of State from the proper authority, enclosing an official copy of the decree of the Mexican Congress alluded to. But he would still maintain that he was correct in his former assertion, that no proposition of reference had been made by Mexico, nor any greater willingness expressed by the Executive of that country, to execute the power contained in the first than the second branch of the decree. He regretted to say that he was not able to see in the time and manner of communicating the decree, any stronger evidence of a friendly spirit than in the decree itself. But, in order to explain the reasons of this opinion, he begged leave to send to the Chair a copy of the decree in the Spanish language, and a translation thereof, which he had obtained, and asked that the latter might be read for the information of the House and the nation. For this unusual and irregular mode of introducing such a document into the House, he must throw himself upon their kindness, which he would not have appealed to, if it had not been for the very extraordinary character of this debate, and the necessity of guarding the public mind from erroneous impressions upon this deeply interesting topic.

Mr. H. then sent to the Chair the following paper, which was read:

DECREE.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

His Excellency the President of the Mexican Republic has been pleased to address to me the following Decree:

The President of the Mexican Republic to the inhabitants. Be it known, that the General Congress has decreed as follows:

ART. 1. The Government is authorized to arrange (or compromise, transigir) with regard to the claims preferred, or which may be preferred, by that of the United States of the North, and to commit to the judgment of a friendly Power the decision of those upon which they cannot come to a determination, provided the United States themselves agree to this.

ART. 2. The Government is also authorized—in case the United States should deny the satisfaction which we should ask on our part, or delay it beyond the time which shall be fixed conformably with the treaty, or should continue the open agressions already committed—to close the ports to the trade of that nation, to prohibit the introduction and use of its manufactures, to establish a period for the consumption or exportation of those already on hand, and to take all measures required for the purpose, and for the safety of the Republic.

MIGUEL VALENTIN, President.

TERSO VIEJO, RAFAEL DE MONTALVO, } Secretaries.

Therefore, I order it to be printed, published, circulated, and carried into due fulfilment.

Palace of the National Government in Mexico, May 20, 1837.

ANASTASIO BUSTAMENTE.

LOUIS GONZAGA CUEVAS.

And I communicate it to you, that you may be informed of it, and act accordingly.

God and Liberty! CUEVAS.

May 20, 1837.

Mr. H. then resumed his remarks, and was commenting upon the decree, and the singular fact that the petition before the House entirely suppressed all notice of the second part, when

The SPEAKER begged to remind the gentleman from Maryland that to discuss the subject of our relations with Mexico would be entirely out of order, any allusion thereto being irrelevant on a mere question of reference.

Mr. HOWARD said he would submit to the decision of the Chair with the greatest pleasure. His chief objects were already accomplished by protecting himself against any future suspicion that he had been uncandid in the statement previously made to the House, and by bringing to the notice of the House the decree of the Mexican Congress, which had been utterly misrepresented in the petition which gave rise to this debate.

Mr. PETRIKEN moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Thursday next.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the question would be decided by the House at once. He did not see what was to be gained by delaying its consideration for another week. Mr. A. then adverted to the course of Mr. Howard, and begged to ask him if he did not think it inconsistent, first to take upon himself to deny positively that there had been any proposition, and afterwards to give a qualified denial. He (Mr. A.) hoped that to whatever committee the memorial might be referred, the committee should be required to report. The petition was on one of the most important subjects that could occupy the deliberations of the House. It was a question involving peace and war, now established beyond all contradiction by the gentleman himself. He hoped it would be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report thereon. And truly it was a subject which required the most careful examination, and most elaborate report. He must say that the objections of the gentleman, showed a mind already made up, and that was an additional reason why it should not be referred to the committee, of which he was chairman.

Mr. A. then adverted to the slight change which had been made in the Committee on Foreign Affairs since the late special session, and expressed his opinion that the change had increased, instead of diminished, his objections, as he believed the minds of all of them had been previously made up, that they were all committed on the subject, and had prejudged on the measure before them. In his opinion, no stronger proof was required of the resolution formerly offered in relation to that subject, and of stopping all further debate. It was a duty he owed to himself and the petitioners to have the case referred to a committee which would examine and deliberate, without being influenced by preconceived opinions. For these, and other reasons, Mr. A. said he hoped the House would see that the Committee on Foreign Relations was not the proper committee to which the petition ought to be referred. The message of the President, stimulating a war between this country and Mexico, had been already referred to that committee; and what reason could they have for objecting to report on this petition? Why to him it appeared plain that the chairman had his war report on the Message already in his mind; and it would not, perhaps, be convenient for him to report on the honorable proposition before them at the same time. Mr. A. concluded his remarks by asking the yeas and nays on the motion to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; which were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD asked if he should trespass beyond the endurance and patience of the House, if he were to say a few words more upon a subject of which, he was aware, they were heartily tired. He had been dragged into the debate, which was entirely irregular. Unwilling to encroach upon the rules of order, he felt himself continually fettered in his remarks, by being obliged to keep constantly present to his mind the conformity of what he was about to say with the rules of the House. But he was constrained to refer again to what he had said, in order that his exact position might not be mistaken. The first debate occurred in this House on Monday, the eighteenth instant, a summary of which was published on the next morning, in one of the daily papers of this city, and commented upon on Wednesday the 20th. In the course of that week he (Mr. H.) had satisfied himself, upon due inquiry, that no proposition of reference had been made by the Mexican to the American Government, nor had the decree of the Congress of the former been communicated in any official shape whatever. When the debate was renewed on Tuesday, the 26th, he had stated this to the House. But he was afterwards informed that a communication from the Mexican Minister, dated on the 23d, at Philadelphia, had been received at the Department of State, enclosing a copy of the decree. Without stopping to comment upon the expedition with which this communication followed the notice of this subject in this House, he would merely refer to the improbability, if not impossibility, that he should on the 26th be acquainted with the existence or contents of an official paper, dated on the 23d, at Philadelphia. He now asserted that he was totally ignorant of both. But, as soon as he was informed thereof, he determined to state what he knew to the House, although he was perfectly aware of the irregularity of such a proceeding. He desired that no person might ever have the slightest ground or pretext for saying or thinking, that he tampered with a body which he held in such entire respect, and therefore he had felt it a duty to the House as well as himself, to pursue the only course which was open to him, by stating the whole matter with perfect frankness. He had done this. Upon examining the Decree, it was easy to account for its never having been communicated to this Government from June until December, when the perverted account of it which had been brought before this House, seemed suddenly to have drawn it forth from that obscurity in which it ought to have been permitted to repose. The second part is essentially hostile in its character. It may be well to contrast the conduct of the two Governments. Whilst the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, and the other branch also, were disinclined to confer upon the Executive the power which he had formally stated to be necessary at our hands, of resorting to strong measures for the purpose of redressing the long list of grievances for which he had in vain sought redress, the Congress of Mexico were absolutely vesting in their President all the power which we had withheld from ours. Under some undefined contingency, which, in fact, amounted to an absolute discretion, they had authorized him to close the ports of their country against our vessels, to prohibit the introduction of our manufactures, and even to fix upon a time at which those already in their country must be consumed or exported, under penalty, I presume, of confiscation and forfeiture. What would have been said, if, at our last session, we had conferred such a power upon our President, and the Mexican Congress had abstained from doing so? It requires some effort of the imagination to conceive it, since, when the state of things is precisely reversed, all the fault is still thrown upon our side.

But what shall be said of those who got up this petition, who seem to have been in possession of the entire decree, and yet suppressed the most important half? Is it such a Peace Society as is in favor of universal peace, with the single exception of war upon their own Government, which they wage in a spirit of exterminating hostility? He was unwilling to charge the authors of this petition with a wilful suppression of the truth, because the case did not warrant such an imputation; but he would say that they were guilty of a culpable omission in not setting forth the entire decree, if it was in their possession, or of negligence in omitting to ascertain, as they might easily have done, whether the power to make the proposition of reference had been executed by the President of Mexico. On a former occasion he had remarked, upon the circumstance of nearly all the signatures being in pencil, and compared this condition of the signatures with the evident care and expense with which the memorial had been prepared, to show that the signers were not the authors of it. Who the real authors were he could not undertake to say, but he thought it became them to explain the apparent mystery of their having used so much of the decree as had upon its face an amicable expression, without brinuing also to view the hand below, which was armed with a drawn dagger.

It had pleased the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that the Committee on Foreign Affairs had made up their minds in favor of a war with Mexico, and that the chairman especially was committed to such a course by the report which he had made to the last Congress. Had he known that the report would be criticised with the minuteness with which the honorable gentleman seemed inclined to examine it, he would have been more careful in its preparation; for it was written in one evening, in the interval between dark and bed time. But he was willing to stand upon it as it was, and defied criticism. He knew that it expressed his honest sentiments, and would abide by them. He had made up his mind to two propositions. The first was, that peace was the settled policy of this nation, for all our institutions were founded upon this theory. War is an unnatural and forced position. As long as it was possible to preserve peace, without sacrificing the rights or honor of the nation, he would struggle to maintain it. We held in our hands the destinies of a great people, and must not rashly or lightly put them in jeopardy. This was his first proposition. His second was, that the American nation cherished a lofty sense of honor, and would not only justify, but require their rulers to govern themselves accordingly. If driven by the injustice of any foreign power to seek what redress they could obtain by the exertion of their own strength, they might lament the necessity, but would perform the duty. These were the opinions with which he would approach the consideration of our relations with Mexico, so pregnant with painful anxiety. It had pleased the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that he (Mr. H.) probably had his war report already prepared. In reply, he would content himself with saying that after the committee should have fully investigated the subject in all its bearings, with the feelings which became them as representatives of a magnanimous people, studious to preserve their best interests, if it should please that committee to instruct him to draft a report, then, and not till then, would he undertake the task.

Mr. PETRIKEN moved to postpone the further consideration until Thursday next: lost.

The motion to commit was then agreed to—yeas 117, nays 51.

So the memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the First Comptroller, transmitting abstracts of moneys advanced, &c. which was laid on the table.

Mr. EVERETT offered the following, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House copies of all correspondence between the Government of the United States and Mexico, and all instructions given to our Ministers at the Court of Mexico since the date of the Mexican Treaty of 1828 not heretofore communicated to this House; and also, that he be requested to transmit copies of all correspondence since the date aforesaid, and not heretofore communicated to this House, between the Executive of the the United States, and our Minister at the Court of Mexico, and which in his opinion may be communicated without prejudice to the public interest.

On motion of Mr. EWING,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from Spencer, Owen county, through New Brunswick, Clay county, and thence, via Thomas Springer's, to Merom, in Sullivan county, Indiana. Also, a post road from Bedford, Lawrence county, via Mr. Short's, on Indian creek, to Bloomfield, Green county; thence, via Scaffold Prairie, to Bowling Green, Clay county, Indiana. Also, a post road from Bedford, Lawrence county, via Spice Valley, to Mount Pleasant, Martin county, Indiana. Also, a post road from Vincennes, via James Stewart's, to Ramsay's mill, at the rapids at Wabash; thence to Mount Carmel, Illinois.

On motion of Mr. YELL,

SELECT COMMITTEE

On the resolution proposed in the Senate by Mr. ALLEN, of Ohio, to amend the Constitution, passed in the Senate some days since:

Messrs. ALLEN, Chairman,
WRIGHT,
CALHOUN,
BUCHANAN,
WEBSTER,
BENTON,
RIVES,
CRITTENDEN,
CLAYTON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
FRIDAY, December 29, 1837.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio made a request to the House to suffer, by general consent, the committees to report this morning, and afterwards proceed with the business on the private calendar.

Mr. REED and others suggested that petitions had better be presented first.

The CHAIR remarked that petitions were the first thing in order.

Mr. WHITTLESEY'S motion being objected to, he moved a suspension of the rules, which was disagreed to.

Petitions and memorials were then called for in the order of States, and a number were presented by—

Messrs. EVANS, FAIRFIELD, ANDERSON, NOYES, DAVEE, and CILLEY, of Maine.

[Mr. DAVEE presented the petition of Thomas A. Hill and 102 others, for a new mail route from Bangor, via Waterville, to Augusta, Maine. Also, the petition of Spaulding Robinson and 87 others, for a mail route from the military road to Fisk's mills, State of Maine; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.]

Messrs. CUSHMAN and WILLIAMS of New Hampshire.

[Mr. CUSHMAN moved that the following petitions be taken from the files, and again referred, viz: Petition of sundry inhabitants of Portsmouth, N. H. praying for an appropriation for the improvement of that harbor, by erecting a breakwater between New Castle and Goat Island. Petition of sundry inhabitants of Rye, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of that harbor. Petition of sundry inhabitants of Exeter, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of that harbor and the navigation of Exeter river: referred to the Committee on Commerce.]

Messrs. REED, BRIGGS, CUSHING, CALHOUN, LINCOLN, GRENNELL, BORDEN, PARMENTER, and ADAMS, of Massachusetts.

[Mr. PARMENTER presented the petition of Susan Bassett and 1,568 other women of Charlestown, Massachusetts, for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; the same against the annexation of Texas. Also, the petition of Samuel Gott and others for a surveyor of the customs to reside at Sandy bay, in Gloucester, Massachusetts. Also, the petition of Major Thomas Harrison, for increase of pension. Also, the petition of Henry Hatch, administrator, for indemnity for captures by the French prior to 1800.

The petition on the abolition of slavery was laid on the table, under the order of the House.

Mr. P. moved to refer the Texas petition to a select committee; but on motion of Mr. MORGAN of Virginia, it was laid on the table.]

[Mr. ADAMS, after presenting sundry petitions in relation to the cultivation of the mulberry tree and the manufacture of silk, said he would now present the petition of Sarah Payne, and 119 others, inhabitants of Halifax, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Mr. A. observed, that as he had before declared the resolution adopted by the House "laying all such petitions on the table" was unconstitutional, and consequently null and void, he did not hold himself bound by that resolution any further than he was bound to submit to physical force. With that view he considered he still had the right of moving a reference of the petition to a committee, and also all other petitions with which he might be entrusted. He had in his possession a petition, which he intended to offer, demanding that the resolution should be rescinded by the House. He did not propose to offer the petition then, but he would offer it, and he gave notice that at the same time he should offer a resolution to rescind the former resolution. With that understanding, he would postpone the presentment of the petition until a fit opportunity. He would also inform them, that since the adoption of that obnoxious resolution, a great number of petitions had arrived from Philadelphia and other cities expressing, in the strongest terms, the indignation of the petitioners at that tyrannical and unjustifiable measure.

Mr. LAWLER wished to know what question was before the House.

The CHAIR intimated to the member from Massachusetts that his remarks were irrelevant to the subject before the House.

Mr. ADAMS. I was merely giving notice of my intention to move to rescind that infamous resolution. I do not submit to that resolution, any more than I am obliged to submit to the power of the House: I denounce it as unconstitutional and oppressive.]

Mr. TILLINGHAST of Rhode Island.

On motion of Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, a Senate bill for the relief of Captain Samuel Warren was read twice and referred.

Mr. MORRIS offered the following resolutions, remarking that he had prepared them by way of amendment to those offered by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun.) In drafting them he had, as far as his own opinion would permit, followed the text of those to which he had alluded, yet with variations calculated, in his view, to protect the right of petition, the freedom of speech, and the liberty of the press.

In offering the resolutions, the Senator from South Carolina had thrown the glove, and with expressions of triumph asserted that none in the Senate could vote, in his opinion, against his views. He, however, dared to enter the lists single-handed, and engage with him. He wished the resolutions laid on the table and printed, and, when considered, that they be taken up and acted upon one by one, in order.

[These resolutions were given in the Globe yesterday.]

After being read by the Secretary,

Mr. CALHOUN had expressed his hopes that his proposition would meet with general favor from the Senate. He had expected some trifling opposition, but nothing in the light of the present movement. It was, however, now decided that no concession or sacrifice would satisfy the opposition. We had here a fair specimen of the doctrine in full color. Yes, here was displayed the absolute creed of the Abolitionists fully developed; and from this he had little hope that his desire to promote the harmony of the Union would be gratified. He, however, sternly denied throughout the charges brought against him by the gentleman who had offered the resolutions.

The motion to print was then agreed to.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of the widow of Capt. Patrick, late of the army, for relief: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

Bill for the relinquishment of the 16th section of School lands

Also, bill for the relief of Daniel Bush.

Also, bill to ratify certain acts of John Pope, late Governor of Arkansas.

The number now in the service;

The authority under, and by which, allies have been employed, and the terms and conditions upon which they do or have served;

The amount of naval force, if any, that has been employed on this service, and whether, and to what extent, it has been employed on land; if steam vessels have been employed, and how many, and for what kind of service;

The entire disbursements made by the United States to carry on this war up to this time;

The probable arrearages now due;

The whole number of the Seminole population at the commencement of hostilities; the number of warriors there; the number killed, and the number taken prisoners by the United States; the number that has come in, and voluntarily surrendered; the number of warriors that have emigrated; the number still remaining; the number of other corps who have emigrated, and the number remaining; the probable number of arms possessed by the Seminole Indians at the commencement of the war, and the sources from which they have obtained supplies of ammunition.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

Resolved, That Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate a statement of the amount annually paid for Revolutionary pensions in each State and Territory, and in the District of Columbia, from the year 1789, to the present time; also, the annual aggregate amount of the same payments for pensions during the same period.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of the militia, called out by the Indian Agent at Logansport, Indiana, to suppress a threatened riot, at the payment of the annuity at that place, in the year 1836.

On motion of Mr. LYON,

The resolution by Mr. NILES for information from the Postmaster General relative to the expediency of transmitting money by mail, &c. was, in an amended form, adopted.

The bill to amend the act of 1790, providing for punishment of certain crimes against the United States, was taken up for consideration, and an amendment substituting for "death" that of "imprisonment to hard labor for a term not less than ten years, or for life, at the discretion of the court," for the crime of burning public buildings or documents, was adopted—yeas 23, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Walker, Webster, Williams, and Young—23.

The bill, with other amendments, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the executrix of the late Richard W. Meade was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and discussed at some length; and, after the adoption of some amendments, was finally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the erection of a hospital in the District of Columbia was debated in Committee of the Whole.

The blank, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, was filled with $50,000.

An amendment, offered by Mr. SEVIER, was discussed, giving the privilege of admission to marines and soldiers of the United States; when,

On motion, The Senate adjourned.

Mr BELL of Tennessee.

Messrs. CALHOUN and RUMSEY of Kentucky.

Messrs. OWENS and HOLSEY of Georgia.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, the following resolution, submitted by him some days since, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House what number of the Cherokee tribe of Indians are yet remaining within the limits of the State of Georgia; how many have gone west of the river Mississippi, in conformity to the late treaty between that tribe and the Government of the United States; whether he apprehends any difficulty in removing those who yet remain, when the time stipulated in the treaty for their removal shall arrive; what portion, if any, of said tribe has signified their intention not to conform to said treaty; whether he has any information in his Department indicating a hostile intent among said Indians towards the citizens of Georgia; and whether he has any reason which may incline him to apprehend that said Indians, or any part of them, may commit acts of violence upon the citizens, or depredations on their property, about the time they shall be required by the treaty to remove; what military force he has established in that section of the Union to secure the enforcement of the treaty, if necessary, and to prevent acts of violence or depredations by the Indians; whether he anticipates an increase of military strength in that section, to what extent and at what time, and that the Secretary be requested to say whether any precautionary measures should be adopted, on the part of Congress, to aid his Department in causing the execution of the treaty with the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and preventing acts of violence and depredations from said Indians, or any part of them.

Mr. WISE submitted the following, which Mr. DAWSON accepted as a modification:

"Also, whether any report has been made by the agent lately sent to the Cherokees, and if so, and not incompatible with the public interest, that the Secretary of War be requested to communicate the said report to this House."

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina submitted the following, which Mr. DAWSON also accepted: Strike out "State of Georgia" wherever it occurs, and insert "the said tribe of Indians east of the Mississippi river."

Mr. EVERETT submitted the following amendment thereto:

"And that the President be requested to lay before this House copies of all documents relating to the regulation of the late treaty with the Cherokee Indians, and of all communications of the Cherokee Indians relative thereto."

After some brief observations from Mr. DAWSON on the resolution,

Mr. WISE wished to ask whether a report had not been already made by commissioners appointed by the Executive. He understood that at least a thousand cases of fraud had been made out, but which had never been reported to the House. He said he gathered his information from an agent, recently returned from among the Cherokees, whom he knew to be a gentleman, and any statement he made respecting those oppressed people might be safely relied upon as correct. Mr. W. then alluded to the practice of making citizens of foreigners, whose views were frequently inimical to our own, and asked upon what principle of justice the Government refused to grant the prayer of the Cherokee Indians, who wished to become naturalized. Thus (said Mr. W.) they might be permitted to remain on the land of their forefathers, enjoying all the benefits of our institutions. As a further reason why their wish should be granted, Mr. W. adverted to their high state of civilization. He thought it highly desirable that the report of the agent recently arrived from the Cherokees should be made to the House, in addition to the former information.

Mr. DAWSON had no objection whatever to such a course. The object of his resolution was simply to ascertain the exact state of affairs at that time in relation to the treaty, and to lay all the information before the House.

Mr. WISE proposed to amend the resolution, by adding to the end thereof: "also, if any report has been made by the agent lately sent to the Cherokees, and if not incompatible with the public interest, that he communicate said report to this House;" which modification was accepted.

Mr. HOLSEY had no desire to enter into a debate on this subject, but some observations, made by the gentleman from Virginia, made it his duty to say a few words in reply. That gentleman had spoken of the Cherokees as an "oppressed people." Without going into any argument on the subject, he would simply allege, that they were within the jurisdiction of the State of Georgia, and for her policy, Georgia held herself responsible to none but God and her conscience. When the gentleman spoke so strongly and feelingly about oppression, he evidently had his eye fixed on the policy of Georgia. He (Mr. H) would repel the charges and insinuations thrown out against the State which he had the honor of representing. He would tell him that Georgia would stand upon her reserved rights, and would never relinquish them. He would tell him that the people of Georgia would never consent to have naturalized Indians among them, who, civilized as they were said to be, were not fit to associate with free born citizens of the United States. What, he would ask, were they to have a nation of semi-barbarous people thrust upon them, and fastened forever upon the jurisdiction of Georgia? That policy was one which would be repelled at all hazards; and her people would never submit to have a set of harpies forced upon her, to prey upon her substance. Whenever such an attempt should be made, it would meet with a determined resistance.

Mr. WISE was of opinion that the gentleman, in his remarks, had exhibited a great deal of unnecessary zeal about Georgia, as, in his observations on the oppression of the Indians, he had alluded to the General Government, and not to the State of Georgia. He had not "the policy of Georgia in his eye," but the Legislative and Executive branches of the General Government, which were the oppressors of the Indians, and by whose officers a treaty had been forced upon them. Yes, if they would give him but twelve honest men of the State of Georgia, he would prove it by that jury that the treaty had been forced upon the Cherokees in the face of the officers of our own standing army, and thus incurring the liability of a war. Mr. W. then made some allusions to the former and present policy of Georgia. He contended that notwithstanding what had been said by the member from that State, about the resistance which would be made to any attempt to naturalize the Cherokees, it was his conviction that there was no lawyer in Georgia who would deny the right of the General Government to accomplish it. In his opinion, the Government had just as good a right to make an Indian a citizen, as an Irishman; and if they were made citizens, it would be no disparagement to the citizens of Georgia. They had now in the city a Georgian, who was Secretary of State; and they had, also, an Indian from Georgia of the Cherokee tribe, named John Ross, who would, at any time, compare in intellect and moral honesty with John Forsyth. He wished to know why such Indians as these were not as eligible to become citizens as the hordes of foreigners from the old world. The Cherokees had assisted in fighting the battles of our country, and had fought side by side with the white man in the struggle for her liberties; and what reason could be assigned why they should not share in its beneficial results?

Mr. GLASCOCK regretted that any unnecessary discussion had arisen on the resolution offered by his colleague. He understood the motives of his colleague were simply to put the House in possession of the instruction which was needed, and to let the people of Georgia know what they might expect from the General Government in relation to the fulfilment of the treaty, and their peculiar situation. He regretted that his colleague should have deemed it necessary to allude to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise;) but as the policy of Georgia had been attacked, he would observe that Georgia had assumed a certain line of conduct in relation to the Cherokees; and she would, at all hazards, pursue that policy. It seemed to him, that if the gentleman had any measure to propose in relation to John Ross, or the naturalization of the Indians, the most proper course would be to bring in a special bill for that purpose, as it was totally irrelevant and unconnected with the present question. With regard to the intellect of John Ross, he was willing to admit that he was a man of excellent judgment; but when an attempt was made to compare him with the Secretary of State, he thought it a most extraordinary comparison, coming from a man of such discernment as the gentleman from Virginia.

But the people of Georgia were anxious to know what course the General Government intended to pursue, in order that they might take their own measures accordingly. The treaty having been made, Georgia expected all the facility in the power of Government to carry it into effect, and that all the requisite assistance would be granted by the Secretary of War.

The gentleman talked about fraud and oppression; but he would ask him if this were the proper occasion for such a charge, now that the treaty had received the sanction of both Houses, and become the law of the land? If he recollected right, the gentleman from Virginia himself voted in favor of the treaty.

Mr. WISE. No. I beg to say that such was not the case. I battled it for four years.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Well, it received the sanction of a large majority in this House and in the Senate; and it is enough for our purpose that the treaty was made the law of the land, and carried into effect. Mr. G. then proceeded at some length to trace the probable evil results of the present discussion, and the bad feeling it would cause among the Cherokees. It would, in a manner, countenance their resistance to the fulfilment of the treaty, and hence it was possible that depredations might arise, and the same scenes again attempted, which made humanity shudder.

Mr. GRAHAM moved to further modify the resolution, by striking out "State of Georgia," and inserting "the said tribe of Indians east of the Mississippi river."

Mr. DAWSON felt glad that the resolution had given rise to the present discussion, as it had thrown open the subject in such a way as to give him and his colleagues an opportunity of stating the true condition of things. He, for one, was proud to avow to the world that the Cherokee Indians were the most moral of any tribe in the United States. But to what cause was it to be attributed. He would tell them. Their high state of civilization had grown out of the humane policy pursued toward them by their neighbors. It was the people of Georgia who had accomplished it, by establishing missionaries among them, and adopting other salutary measures. The Legislature of Georgia had thrown her protection around them, and placed them upon the same footing as the white man, and injuries could no more be inflicted upon an Indian with impunity, than thay could upon their own citizens. But his object in offering the resolution, was that the true state of affairs might be made known to the country. Georgia desired not to interfere with any arrangements of the General Government, but in justice to herself required information, as to the course the Government intended to pursue.

Mr. EVERETT made some remarks, in which he endeavored to show that no treaty had ever been made by the Cherokees, and that the agents who claimed to have represented them had not been authorized so to do; consequently, it would be extremely unjust to attempt to force them from their country, in pursuance of a pretended treaty, when, in fact, none such had ever been made or agreed to by them. With that view, he moved an amendment to the resolution, as follows: "and that the President be requested to lay before this House copies of all documents relating to the regulation of the late treaty with the Cherokee Indians, and of all communications of the Cherokee Indians relating thereto."

Mr. HOLSEY replied at length. He urged that, the treaty having been made and confirmed by Congress, the Executive had a right to make use of the standing force of the nation to compel its fulfilment.

Mr. WISE was in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. Everett;) for he was certain that, when all the documents came to be examined, there was no man who would say that the treaty had ever been ratified by the Cherokees.

Mr. DAWSON made an ineffectual attempt to induce Mr. EVERETT to withdraw his amendment.

After some further remarks from Messrs. EVERETT and GLASCOCK,

Mr. HAYNES said it was obvious that there was no connection between the original resolution, as offered by his colleague, (Mr. Dawson,) and the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. Everett.) The purpose of the resolution was to obtain information from the War Department touching the progress made in the execution of the Cherokee treaty, and the measures which might hereafter become necessary to enforce its fulfilment. We desired to obtain that information for the purpose of quieting the minds of our constituents living in the Cherokee country: that was all. From the amendment itself, proposed by the honorable gentleman from Vermont, it was manifest that his object was to bring up the question of treaty or no treaty. But that honorable gentleman had distinctly avowed it to be his object to raise that question. It was, he believed, the first time he had ever heard it avowed that this House was the treaty-making power. Mr. H. would not request the honorable member from Vermont to withdraw his proposed amendment, as he did not suppose he could be more successful in appealing to his courtesy than others had been, to whom it had been denied. He would not go into the numerous topics which had been drawn into this discussion. Of the arguments of the honorable gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. Everett,) and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) he would say, that their sum and substance was this: that a treaty was very good if they liked it, and very bad if they did not like it.

Mr. DAWSON again expressed a hope that the amendment of Mr. Everett would be withdrawn.

Mr. OWENS moved to lay it on the table; but the question being taken on his motion, it was lost.

After some further debate between Messrs. WISE, GRANTLAND, TOWNS and EVERETT, the question was taken on Mr. Everett's amendment, and rejected without a division.

The resolution, as modified by Mr. Wise, was then agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT submitted the following: "And that the President be requested to lay before this House copies of all documents relating to the regulation of the late treaty with the Cherokee Indians, and of all communications of the Cherokee Indians relative thereto."

Some further remarks were then made by Messrs. EVERETT, WISE, GRANTLAND, TOWNS, and GLASCOCK; when

Mr. OWENS moved to lay the whole subject on the table: lost.

Mr. HAYNES then spoke for some time against the proposed amendment of Mr. EVERETT; when the question was taken, and it was rejected, without a division.

Mr. WISE, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee, to consist of ——— members, be appointed, to inquire into the expediency of so amending the Constitution of the United States, as to prohibit the appointment of members of Congress to Executive offices during the time for which they are elected Senators or Representatives, and the time of two years thereafter.

After some remarks from Messrs. WISE, HAYNES, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, UNDERWOOD and YELL, and before the question was taken, on motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 2, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of Benoit Henri Lubitsh-Klimkiewitch, late a lieutenant-colonel in the Polish service, and nephew of Thaddeus Kosciusko, for relief.

Mr. B. remarked that the petitioner was now in Philadelphia in great distress. He only asked of Congress a grant of land to which he could retire, and by his exertions sustain himself; or would even be satisfied to purchase a section of land, on risk of his own ability to pay for the same at Government price in the course of one or two years: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McKEAN presented petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, against the annexation of Texas: laid on the table.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Anna Boyd, widow of a Revolutionary officer, for relief: referred.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of 100 citizens of Berrien county, Michigan, for the enactment of a general pre-emption law: referred.

Mr. RUGGLES presented memorials of citizens of Maine, against the annexation of Texas, and on the subject of the abolition of slavery: laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of a large number of citizens of Philadelphia, relative to the sudden discharge of five hundred mechanics from the navy yard in that city, and asking an appropriation for the completion of the frigate Raritan, now on the stocks; thus affording employment for said mechanics.

Mr. BUCHANAN, in presenting this memorial, would make a single remark in relation to it. A very large number of industrious and skilful mechanics had been suddenly deprived of employment at the navy yard in Philadelphia, at this inclement season of the year. Many of them with large families, were now in a suffering condition, without the hope of relief during the present winter, unless the Government will afford them employment. They ask only that they may be permitted to give a fair equivalent in labor, when it is required to be performed by the public interest, for bread for themselves, their wives and their children. It had been represented to him, and was so stated in the memorials, that the frigate Raritan was then decaying on the stocks in the navy yard at Philadelphia. If this were the fact, and he had no reason to doubt it, the interest of the United States required that these mechanics should be employed upon this frigate. Public policy thus harmonised with the claims of humanity. He begged leave, therefore, to commend the claims of these suffering mechanics to the favorable and immediate attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN also presented ten memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, against the annexation of Texas. Also, three on the subject of abolition; a motion to receive which was laid on the table.

Also, two from the same, for the alteration of certain post routes: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, for a dry dock in that city: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Illinois, praying the establishment of a national army at the falls of the Wabash river: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RIVES presented the memorial of the District of Columbia Temperance Society, to abolish the use of ardent spirits in the navy: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Private petitions were also presented by Messrs. GRUNDY, TIPTON, PRESTON, SOUTHARD, NILES, CUTHBERT, and KING, and severally appropriately referred.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Henry Fisher: read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Gustavus Warner; also for the relief of the heirs of Wm. Ramsay: severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a bill for the relief of R. S. Cox;

Mr. WALL, from the same, reported a bill to prevent the counterfeit of foreign coins: severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BENTON introduced a bill to abolish duty on Indian blankets and Indian goods generally: read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War report to the Senate the result of a survey of the Black, White, and St. Francis rivers, together with estimates of the expense of rendering the same navigable.

On motion of Mr. LUMPKIN,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of altering post routes from Rome, Ga. to Somerville, Ala. and other places; also, the reference of seven petitions on the same subject to the same committee: adopted.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so as to bear a just proportion to the salaries of other officers in the Executive Department.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Resolutions and reports of the Committee of Claims, adverse to petitions of John Burke; also, James Pardee; also, John M'Donald; which were adopted.

Bill to amend the act of 1790, relative to the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, in capital cases, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of the executrix of the late Richard W. Meade, was then taken up, and on the question of its passage,

Mr. WRIGHT said he would like it to be postponed until the day after to-morrow, in order that he might have time to look into its merits with some degree of care. He had examined it ten years ago, when he was first in the House of Representatives, but not since that period. It was a bill involving an important principle, as well as the appropriation of an immense amount of money, or he would not have asked this delay on the question of its final passage. He would pledge himself not to ask for a further postponement.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he had no objection to the postponement, convinced, as he was, that the more it was examined, the more would its justice become apparent.

The motion to postpone was adopted.

The bill to authorize the erection of a hospital in the City of Washington, and for other purposes, was then taken up, when

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved its recommitment to the Committee on the District of Columbia, on the ground that they were called on to appropriate money for the erection of a hospital, without proper data or plan. He thought the true course would be to have a full report from that committee, setting forth the plan of the building, the expense of erection, cost of maintenance, on which the Senate could act understandingly.

Mr. WILLIAMS had hoped that the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia would have been in his place when this bill should be acted upon, but as he is not, would state, as well as he could, the reasons which induced the committee to report it. The bill provides for the erection of a hospital in the District of Columbia, for the accommodation and relief of the insane of the District, for such sick and indigent soldiers, seamen, and others, as may be admitted under regulations hereafter to be adopted.

Is there necessity for such an establishment, and is it such an object as calls for the favor and patronage of the nation?

It is now well understood that insanity is a disease as capable of being relieved and cured by proper treatment, and with suitable accommodations, as other acute diseases to which men are subject; and when attended to in its early stages, the proportion of cures is as great in this as in other diseases. A principal instrument in procuring relief and recovery for the insane is comfortable and cleanly accommodations, and kind treatment; and these cannot often be had without some such an establishment as is proposed by the bill under consideration. The committee were not informed of the number of insane persons within the District, but it is believed that in the United States the average is about one in a thousand of population; and as the population of the District of Columbia is said to be from 30 to 40,000, it is safe to estimate that there are from 30 to 40 insane persons in the District. Beside the insane, there are many persons annually who come to the seat of Government to ask of Congress what they consider to be due to them; and they remain pursuing their claims until their means of support are exhausted, and many of them are compelled to ask charity from their representatives, or be thrown upon the District for relief. Many of these are soldiers and seamen who have served their country, and think themselves entitled to the bounty of their Government, but whose means are not adequate to their support while waiting the slow progress of the acts of Congress for their relief. Now, unless such persons can obtain charity from their representatives in Congress, or friends whom they may happen to find here, they must be thrown upon the city authorities for support. And why should the city be at the charge of furnishing support to such persons, not belonging to the city? There is not only no reason for it, but the city has not, in fact, the means of affording it. The only building provided by the city for the relief of the poor is a poor-house, or asylum, which is already filled by persons belonging to the city, and who have a right to be supported there. Is it not, then, right and proper that the nation should be at the expense of providing such accommodation as is contemplated by the bill? Is it not an object worthy the endowment of Congress? In reply to inquiries as to the size of the building contemplated to be erected, and the cost of it, he would state that the President of the Board of Health had furnished an estimate of the cost of such a building as he supposed might be proper, prepared by Mr. Mills, Architect of Public Buildings, and which was to consist of one principal centre building 100 feet long and 58 feet wide, with wings at each end 25 feet wide, projecting 20 feet in front, and 37 feet in rear, of the centre building; to be three stories high, and made of hammered stone, would cost from 110 to 115,000 dollars, and would accommodate 120 patients and 30 insane persons, with all attendants, matrons, and assistants. The committee were disposed to adopt a less expensive plan, and reported an appropriation of 50,000 dollars, relying that the President, under whose control the whole subject was to be placed, would take all necessary means to ascertain the best plan, before he would sanction it.

Still, however, if the Senate were not satisfied with the information now communicated, he had not the least objection to the recommitment of the bill to the committee who reported it.

Mr. SEVIER said when it was under consideration the other day he had offered an amendment going to embrace seamen, soldiers, and every body else; he thought if it were contemplated to build an immense poor house in the District it was as well to make it as extensively useful as possible. He would withdraw his amendment, however, as in this city he found that said soldiers and sailors (of which there were very few) were already provided for, and there was a poor house, for the poor of the District, provided by its authorities. If we built an immense hospital here in the shape of a general alms-house, we should have the poor and beggars from all quarters asking to be received, where they could have a living better even than those who labored honestly for it. Another great objection to his mind was, that no estimate had been furnished—no ground on which to go—and if we went on to legislate thus loosely, we might be called on to make appropriation after appropriation, like we had for the Treasury and Patent Offices, which would cost millions before they were finished.

Mr. NILES wished the bill recommitted, in order that there might be some specific plan. He was opposed to the erection of a magnificent edifice in the metropolis, for the purpose named. He wished the whole proposed plan before the Senate, and alluded to appropriations which had before been made, and fallen short of the accomplishment of their objects, and the one now contemplated might be graduated on the same scale of magnificence.

Mr. WILLIAMS made a reply to Mr. Niles, and had the memorial of the Board of Health of the District read.

The bill was ordered to be recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The bill for the relief of James Witherall was then taken up, and, after being amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of John Newton came up, and was so amended, on motion of Mr. FULTON, as to apply to all similar cases, and authorizing all claimants to bounty lands to surrender them and to locate anew; said law to continue in force five years. The bill was then read, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Frederick Leigle; also, of Samuel Miller; also, of David Stone; also, to amend the act for the better organization of the marine corps; also, for the relief of Andrew Armstrong; also, of Gaetano Carusi; also, of the heirs of Moses Elmer; also, of John Gordon; also, of the heirs of Maj. Peter Helferstein; also, to abolish public executions in capital cases; also, for the relief of Joseph Boggy; also, of Sebastian Butcher; and the bill to enforce the act of July 9, 1832, for the adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, were severally read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to revoke the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia was then taken up; and, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the further consideration thereof was postponed till Monday next.

And then,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 3, 1838.

Mr. TOWNS, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claim of Zachariah Philips, for property destroyed by the Creek Indians in the years 1817 and 1818; and that all papers relating to said claim be referred to said committee.

Mr. HAYNES asked leave to move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's Message, but it was objected to.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

On motion of Mr. BELL, the rules were suspended to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections, in making a report agreeably to the order of the House, of the facts in the case of the application of S. S. Prentiss and J. J. Word, to be admitted and qualified as members of the 25th Congress from the State of Mississippi, be directed to discriminate between the evidence submitted to the Committee of Elections at the late called session, under the resolution of the House directing an inquiry whether J. H. Claiborne and S. J. Gholson were entitled to their seats as members from the same State, and the evidence submitted at the present session.

Mr. HAMER saw no necessity for the adoption of this resolution, as under the recent order, the committee were required to make a full statement of all the facts, and to give a complete view of the case, and it seemed to him, as a matter of course, that they must notice what took place at the late extra session. It seemed really to be a work of supererogation to require the committee to discriminate, and unless he heard some good reason assigned, he should vote against the resolution.

Mr. BELL said, that when he offered the resolution he was not aware that the order of the House had instructed the Committee to report on the facts and evidence adduced at the last session. But it was his opinion that the literal construction of the order did not require the Committee to make that statement, at least not a full statement. He thought it material that the House should know on what evidence its former decision had been made. It was nothing but right that the House should have the advantage of any new facts which may have come to light, or it might appear that there had been a mis-statement of facts, or fraud, at the former adjudication, although he did not mean to say that such had been the case.

Mr. TILLINGHAST was of opinion that to those gentlemen who looked upon the decision of the last session as a judgment, it was important that the case should be again renewed, if new evidence could be adduced.

Mr. HAMER saw no reason to induce him to withdraw his opposition to the resolution. The facts of the case at the last session were familiar to every gentleman in the House, and all the evidence taken before that Committee could easily be obtained.

After some further remarks from Mr. BELL,

Mr. CILLEY saw no necessity for adopting the resolution, in as much as the committee would report on all the facts, when the House could discriminate for itself. But with a view of removing all objections, he would move to amend the resolution, by instructing the committee to report on all the facts at the called session as well as at the present.

Mr. WISE viewed the members of the committee as analogous to commissioners in chancery, who were almost invariably instructed to present their accounts in a certain form. He could see no disrespect in instructing the members of the committee, or any other public servants, to do their duty.

Mr. PATTON suggested to Mr. BELL that his resolution appeared rather calculated to confuse the question. He was of opinion that the order already made by the House would cover all the ground contemplated.

Mr. PARKER was opposed to the resolution as wholly unnecessary, and uncalled for by the circumstances of the case. With that view, he moved to lay it, together with the amendment on the table.

On this motion, Mr. BELL asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered—were yeas 96, nays 92. So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. REED moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of calling the residue of the States for petitions, commencing at the point where the House left off yesterday, (at Virginia;) which was agreed to—106 to 34.

Before the CHAIR replied,

Mr. OWENS raised the question of consideration, which was decided to be the preliminary one.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, moved that the House adjourn. Lost.

Messrs. WISE and BELL raised the question that the point of order should be first decided, on the ground that otherwise the House might be called upon to vote on a proposition which might be out of order, or even impertinent.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if the subject, being a petition, must not stand over for debate.

The CHAIR replied that the petition was not then under discussion, but the question of order. He added that there was some weight in the suggestions on that point, and referring to a statement made by Mr. CUSHING of the contents of the aforesaid joint resolutions, which were to repeal Mr. PINCKNEY'S resolution, (in substance the same as that of Mr. PATTON.) He then decided that the whole subject came under the order of the House ordering all papers relating to abolition to be laid on the table.

Mr. C. explained as the reason why this bill had not been reported in twenty days, as required by the rule of the House, that the estimates from the Department did not all come in till the 17th day of the session.

The bill was then read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Henr Lynch: read twice and committed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the same committee, reported a resolution referring certain estimates of the Indian bureau to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was concurred in.

Also, a similar resolution, referring similar matters to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads: concurred in.

Also a resolution referring certain matters therein referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. C. explained why the Committee of Ways and Means moved their discharge from those subjects. By a rule of the House that committee could not report appropriations for any object, unless it had been authorized by a pre-existing law. He also drew the attention of the House to another very excellent rule, making it out of order to move any amendment for which no law had been passed.

Mr. RENCHER, from the same committee, reported Senate bill for the relief of Timothy J. Pickering, with a recommendation that the same do not pass: committed.

Mr. POPE, from the same committee, reported a bill making appropriations for certain roads, for the year 1838: read twice and committed.

On motion,

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

[A slight sketch of these proceedings only is given. The remarks of the several speakers will be given from time to time, as they are prepared from the reporters' notes.]

The resolutions having been read by the Secretary,

Mr. CALHOUN said he did not rise with a view to discuss the merits of the doctrines in the resolutions, but to repel the ground assumed by those opposed to them in their peculiar regard for freedom of speech, freedom of press, and the sacred right of petition. His chief object in urging an early action was, that the ground taken by these resolutions was distinctly different from that assumed by the other side; and his main wish in asking that the resolutions from Vermont might be postponed, was a desire to meet them in a manner which he deemed most consonant with the duties he owed to the South as an individual, and the relation he bore to the country as a firm and unflinching supporter of the Union. He had remarked, at the time the Vermont resolutions were presented, that if no other member called them up, he pledged himself to do so. In the mean time, he had consulted his own mind as to the best mode of meeting the momentous subject, and had come to the fixed conclusion that the resolutions he had presented were the best calculated to fix the ground on which all could meet, and dispassionately and sincerely consult the interests of the whole The resolutions from Vermont were to have been presented to-morrow; and had he retained his former opinion, he would have voted against their reception; but they, coming from a sovereign State, (and being himself the advocate of State rights,) he should urge a free and full discussion concerning them, as having a higher claim than the petitions of infatuated individuals. As an advocate of State rights, he would not feel himself bound to vote against hearing these resolutions, but as a southern man, feeling his dearest privileges so dangerously assailed, he could not vote for their reception. Thus trammelled as he was, he felt unwilling to leave the field, and in order to obtain a right to present his own views, he had prepared these resolutions as best adapted for the purpose, by presenting an antagonist course. His wish was to test the entire strength of the Senate on the subject, and to decide whether any neutral ground could be adopted, on which to rally, and check this dangerous and fatal doctrine. It was the one and the only one, as he before observed, of sufficient magnitude to endanger the Union, and this already had force enough to shake one political system to its very centre. On one side, there was a portion of the people of the North, who assert and maintain that our domestic institutions are sinful and immoral. On the other we claim our institutions as secured to us under the Constitution, which we will not suffer them to interfere with, and there was the point at issue. On this subject there were two modes of action: the one to repel attack and aggression; the other to stay the tide, if possible, by the means he had introduced.

Mr. C. professed himself a firm, unflinching friend of the Union. He was averse to making professions, but he had on that head been shamefully and grossly misrepresented there and elsewhere. But here was an occasion for the true friends of the Union to come forward and show themselves. On this subject he wanted a direct vote, such as was due to the magnitude of the occasion, and that the wishes and feelings of all should be known. If the resolutions were defective in principle, let them be voted down; if incorrect in phraseology, let them be amended; but he would ask those who believed them correct to give them their cordial support.

Mr. MORRIS asked to take the vote on each separate amendment. The resolutions in themselves were, to his mind, broad, sweeping, and denunciatory. What was the object of these resolutions? Was it not that a free discussion on an important question should not only be discountenanced, but silenced by a vote of that body; they were partial in their bearing, speaking on one side, and not on the other. Mr. M. for one, did not believe that Southern rights existed antagonist to those of any other portion. Why talk of attacks on Southern interests and Southern feelings? Such sentiments might lead to geographical distinctions, but could never lead to the peace and happiness of the whole country. Mr. M. professed himself a State rights man, and had as high a devotion to the Union as any one; but he did not agree with the views of the Senator, that this Republic was a Confederacy of separate and independent States. He considered the Constitution to be adopted and ratified by the united voice of the people. Mr. M. wished to know what the Senator from South Carolina meant by interfering with domestic policy? Would that gentleman contend that because he (Mr. M.) talked of slavery in the abstract as a moral sin, that he should have his rights abridged? Freedom of speech, of the press, and the sacred right of petition, were all sought to be put down at one fell swoop. If we could not meet together and discuss subjects, and compare conditions with others, for evil or for good, we should, instead of progressing in our high destiny, retrograde, and be the merest ciphers. Was such a state of things contemplated by the framers of the Constitution? He should think not. Mr. M. intended to offer his resolutions as amendments; he would not now do so, but intimated his intention to press them on the notice of the Senate hereafter. He conceived the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina liable to the strongest objections, and as warring against the dearest rights and privileges of freemen. The memorial from Vermont had said that slavery was considered a moral and political evil, and asked that it might be abolished in the District of Columbia; and had not that State a right to ask such a measure at the hands of Congress if it thought such a step would tend to the national honor and prosperity?

Mr. M. said when war was made on the freedom of speech, of the press, and the right of petition, these inalienable rights must and would be defended: they were Heaven's best gift to man. He would at this time content himself with a vote on these resolutions, reserving the right to discuss his own as indepeadent resolutions, when they should be brought before the Senate.

Mr. PRESTON suggested some little modification, which was accepted by Mr. CALHOUN.

Mr. ALLEN suggested that it might be as well to strike out the word religious, as all discussions in relation to it were, in his opinion, improper and not called for.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the whole spirit of the resolution hinged upon that word.

Mr. ALLEN would not insist, if the Senator deemed the word important to the spirit of the resolutions.

Mr. MORRIS then moved to strike out the words "moral or religious;" on which he asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRESTON thought the difficulty might be obviated by letting the resolution read, "under any pretence whatever."

Mr. CALHOUN objected. This spirit of abolition was nothing more than that fanaticism that had carried thousands of victims to the stake. What aroused that demoniacal spirit, but the opinion that the faith of one man was criminal in the sight of another. Here the same spirit was attempted to be revived, under the name of abolition, and he trusted to the good sense of the nation to put it down. It was impossible for him to consent to the suggestion of his colleague. The South had been assailed upon the principle that slavery was wicked, and immoral; and could we meet it by such a milk-and-water measure, as that "under any pretext whatever," which, to his mind, was depriving it of its very essence.

Mr. C. expressed his attachment to the specific terms used in the original resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN would express his opinion as firmly and decidedly as any man, in relation to the subject; not wishing to excite prejudices in the minds of any, he thought the resolution quite as strong with the modification as without it.

Mr. ALLEN was unwilling that there should be any allusion to religion in any way whatever; it was not a subject for discussion in the Legislatures of States or in the Senate; it was a matter left entirely to the citizen himself. He deemed the resolution sufficiently comprehensive without the word religious. Mr. A. was opposed to any specification, as it might lead to the ground that those not particularly specified might be supposed to be excluded.

The ground was further debated by Mr. MORRIS and Mr. ALLEN.

Mr. YOUNG thought nothing short of the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina would have the desired effect. He (Mr. Y.) had many friends in Illinois, who were decided Abolitionists, with whom he had reasoned on the danger of their course to the Union, to which all were attached; but with them it was considered a religious duty they had to perform; and hence was of opinion that the provision ought not to be stricken out.

Mr. BAYARD took a constitutional view of the question; and, though he denounced the spirit of abolition as dangerous and wicked in the extreme, yet he did not feel himself authorized to vote for the resolutions. If the doctrine contained in them was correct, then nullification was correct; and, if passed, might hereafter be appealed to as a precedent in favor of that doctrine, though he acquitted the Senator of having the most remote intention of smuggling any thing in relation to that doctrine under cover of these resolutions.

Mr. CALHOUN was glad the Senator acquitted him of any such intention, and regretted that the resolutions should be considered so deeply imbued with "poison." He wished merely to cover the common creed of the State rights party, and he had appealed to gentlemen directly antagonists to him, that if they saw any thing in the resolutions at all savoring of what had been suggested by the Senator, he would immediately pass his pen through it. Mr. C. answered Mr. BAYARD at length, in reply to the constitutional objection.

Mr. BAYARD followed Mr. CALHOUN in reply.

Mr. LUMPKIN addressed the Senate for some time in favor of the resolutions, and retaining them as originally drafted by the Senator from South Carolina. He still believed that there were a very large portion of the North sincerely attached to the Union, and had neither part nor lot in these mischievous proceedings. Mr. L. thought that although they had not the power to check this spirit of fanaticism in that quarter, the Senate might stay the proceedings of these infatuated and misguided people. Mr. L. also took a constitutional view of the subject.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRIS's motion to strike out the words "moral and religious," when there appeared for it 14, against it 31, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tipton, and Webster—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—31.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the adoption of the first resolution, and carried, 31 to 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Davis, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Wall, and Webster—13.

Mr. WEBSTER had no disposition to enter in detail into a discussion on the merits of the resolutions. He admitted the necessity of some definite action on the subject on the part of Congress; but his objection to the adoption of the resolutions now under consideration was based solely on the belief that they were at variance with the correct interpretation of the Constitution. He contended, that though the States might have certain vested rights, yet they were such as were strictly of a local nature, and limited in their extent to strict compliance with constitutional provisions. The constitution and laws of each State in the Confederacy were always founded on this basis, and any variation therefrom became at once illegal.

If the resolutions set forth that all domestic institutions, except so far as the Constitution might interfere, and any intermeddling therewith by a State or individual, was contrary to the spirit of the confederacy, and was thereby illegal and unjust, he would give them his hearty and cheerful support, and would do so still, if the Senator from South Carolina would consent to such an amendment; but in their present form he must give his vote against them.

The Confederacy could never have existed without this prevailing power of the Constitution, and could no longer exist without its continuance. It was difficult to define what domestic institutions were without the pale of the Constitution. Judicature was one of the class, and so with commerce, except inasmuch as the making of treaties was concerned. Yet it was not so as regards slavery. It was the express power of Congress to prohibit the importation of slaves, though the institution was in itself guarantied by the Constitution.

If the resolutions could be modified to meet the constitutional requisitions, asserting that the Constitution permitted slavery, and protected the institution, he would then vote for them. Without such admission, the vote of Congress would be but a dead letter. An assertion here that the Constitution cannot meddle with domestic institutions, if supported, utterly deprives it of power or effect. The doctrines here set forth he viewed as a sweeping declaration against the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. CALHOUN inquired if the gentleman intended to assert the States had no domestic institutions?

Mr. WEBSTER replied by no means. All institutions in the States, such as have solely the State protection, were of that class.

Mr. CALHOUN would be happy to hear them named, that he might procure a catalogue.

Mr. WEBSTER would explain, by naming the institution of mints, as they existed before the Confederacy. This was one of what he termed domestic institutions.

Mr. CALHOUN assumed that there were now many institutions so far domestic as to be wholly within the control of States wherein they existed. Such was negro slavery. The gentleman's views evidently differed materially from his. No one could support an argument against his views respecting slavery. He could name a long catalogue of institutions controlled wholly by States on the same ground. He would not, in establishing such control, inquire and mark out the dividing line of public opinion in the premises. It was alike the sacred right of all, whether of the North or South. These rights, were institutions growing out of the Constitution, and which must be maintained, and could never be meddled with by others, but with the greatest danger to the confederacy.

Mr. WEBSTER inferred from the gentleman's argument, that the question was not whether there were not some domestic institutions beyond the reach of the Constitution, but it claims that all such were beyond its control. It was on this point his principle objections were founded.

Mr. CALHOUN had no objection to striking out all to meet the views of the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) if it was the wish o the Senate so to amend.

Mr. MORRIS moved to strike out certain words in the second resolution; on which the question was taken by yeas and nays, and lost—12 to 32, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Davis, Knight, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, and Webster—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Spence, Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—32.

Mr. YOUNG proposed a further amendment, which was agreed to.

Mr. SOUTHARD objected to further amendment. There was now nothing left of the second resolution but simply a declaration that the States "have just what rights they have."

Mr. DAVIS moved that the Senate adjourn—a division being called for, there were 18 for and 21 against it.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the adoption of the second resolution, and carried, 31 to 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Spence, Strange, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Morris, Prentiss, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Wall, and Webster—9.

Mr. SWIFT gave notice that it was not his intention to present the Vermont resolutions to-morrow, as had been understood, nor would he name any particular day for that purpose.

The Senate adjourned.

And whereas such surrender of a portion of the territory of the United States is of evil precedent and doubtful constitutionality:

And whereas many weighty considerations of policy make it expedient to re-establish the said true boundary, and to re-annex to the United States the territory occupied by the State of Texas, with the consent of the said State:

Be it therefore resolved, That, with the consent of the said State previously had, and whenever it can be effected consistently with the faith and treaty stipulations of the United States, it is desirable and expedient to re-annex the said Territory to the United States.

Which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, as far as the same may be consistent with the public interest, all the information in either of the Departments, respecting the capture, by the United States sloop of war Natchez, of the Mexican vessel of war the General Urrea, and its subsequent restoration by the United States to the Mexican Government.

Mr. WHITTLESEY submitted to Mr. A. the propriety of withdrawing his request for the present, in order that reports might be received from the standing committees.

Mr. ADAMS could not consent to withdraw it, as he considered it involving a subject of the highest importance, and with that view he moved that the resolution be taken up and considered at this time.

Objection being made,

Mr. ADAMS moved a suspension of the rules. He considered it of the greatest importance that it should be considered without a moment's delay, more especially as in the papers of that morning it would be seen that the peace of the United States was not only endangered with Mexico, but in another quarter. Mr. A. then alluded to the events which had recently transpired on the Canadian frontier.

On the motion to suspend, Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 79, nays 112.

So the rules were not suspended.

NORTHERN FRONTIER.

A Message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, A. VAN BUREN, Esq.

[The message will be found in the proceedings of the Senate.]

The Message, and accompanying letter, having been read, were, on motion of Mr. HOWARD, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FILLMORE then asked leave to offer the following resolution:

And be it further resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House any information in his possession of acts endangering the amicable relations between this Government and that of Great Britain, either by the subjects of Great Britain, or by our own citizens on the Canadian frontier, and what measures have been adopted by the Executive to preserve our neutrality with said kingdom, or repel invasion from a foreign country; and that he furnish the information called for by each of these resolutions in separate communications.

Mr. HOWARD thought the resolution not necessary after the Message just read.

Mr. FILLMORE said he should press it, but withdrew it at that time to give an opportunity to the committees to report.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1838.

Mr. POPE, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas H. Perkins.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported Senate bill for the relief of Samuel Miller, without amendment.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee of Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of John Kerr and John P. Yorke.

Mr. BOON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to authorize Peter Warner, of Indiana, to enter a certain half section of land.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John McGowan, jr.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of William Gregory, deceased.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported Senate bills for the relief of Daniel Bush; for the relief of Joseph Bogy; for the relief of Sebastian Butcher, and the heirs of Bartholomew Butcher; and the bill to continue in force the act in relation to private land claims in Missouri.

Mr. HARLAN also reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Dawson, dec'd.

Mr. COLES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Parker.

Mr. COLES also reported the following resolution, which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of carrying into effect the resolution of the Continental Congress, granting monuments to the memory of general officers of the Revolutionary army, and the resolution to erect a marble column at York, in Virginia.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a resolution referring to that committee all the unfinished business of the Naval Committee of the last Congress; which was concurred in.

Mr. REED, from the same committee, reported the following resolution, which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a chart, in a reduced form, of the harbor of Provincetown, in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel M. Asbury.

Mr. ALLEN of Vermont, from the same committee, reported the following, viz:

Bill for the relief of Nathaniel Davis.

Bill for the relief of Robert Whitlett.

Mr. HEROD, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Isaac Boyd.

Mr. FILLMORE then renewed his motion to submit the resolution previously submitted by him.

Objection being made,

Mr. FILLMORE moved a suspension of the rule: lost.

The resolution of Mr. HOWARD (as given above) coming up in its order,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, as far as the same may be consistent with the public interest, all the information in either of the Departments respecting the capture, by the United States sloop of war Natchez, of the Mexican vessel of war the General Urrea, and its subsequent restoration by the United States to the Mexican Government.

Mr. ADAMS now moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

"And also copies of all instructions to the officers of the Government of the United States and all correspondence with them, with the Governors of any of the States, and with the Governments and officers of Mexico and of Great Britain concerning the preservation of the neutrality of the United States in the civil wars and insurrections in Mexico, and in any of the British provinces north of the United States, since the year 1829, and particularly of a letter from the late President of the United States to the Secretary of the Territory of Arkansas, dated on or about the 10th December, 1836."

Mr. FILLMORE then moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

"And that the President be requested to communicate to this House any additional information in his possession of acts endangering the amicable relations between this Government and that of Great Britain, either by the subjects of Great Britain or by our own citizens, on the Canadian frontier, and what measures have been adopted by the Executive to preserve our neutrality with said Kingdom."

Mr. FILLMORE, in support of this amendment, remarked that the House were probably aware that there had been, and now was, a great excitement existing on the Niagara frontier, and that there had been movements in Buffalo in reference to the revolution now raging in Canada. They were also probably aware that an armament had been fitted out, mostly by American citizens, which had made a stand upon Navy Island, which is within British territory, in Niagara river, twenty miles from Buffalo, and two or three miles above the Falls: the lowest point at which a crossing can be effected, safely, from the main shore. The line between the two countries passes between Navy Island, which is well fortified, and Grand Island, which is in the territory of the United States.

Mr. F. understood from letters and papers of very late dates, then before him, that there were upon Navy Island some 1,500 men, who are undergoing a course of military discipline. He had letters to the 30th ult. advising him that a small steamboat, called the Caroline, had been taken down the river from Buffalo, to run as a ferry-boat from the American shore to Navy Island. It seemed that on the 29th an armed force came from the British side, in Canada, and attacked this steamboat, which had been running through the day, and which was then lying within the United States lines, killing some and wounding others, then setting the boat on fire, and sending it over the falls, and, as some accounts alleged, with the wounded still remaining on board. And here Mr. F. read extracts from the letters, which he averred were from the very highest and most responsible sources, confirming his statements as to these incidents. Having done which, he observed that his object now was to ascertain if the Executive had any information upon the subject.

Mr. HOWARD said that this resolution had been reported by a committee. It was not in his power to accept or assent to any amendment—a remark which he would make in relation as well to the amendment offered by Mr. Adams, as to that proposed by Mr. Fillmore. The fact is indisputably true, that the position of affairs upon the Canada frontier was full of interest, and even of jeopardy, to the relations existing between this Government and that of Great Britain. This he should not controvert.

But the remark had been made by Mr. Fillmore, and, Mr. Howard believed, also by Mr. Adams, in offering their respective amendments, that this nation was on the eve of war with Great Britain. He had regretted to hear this remark. He trusted it was not correct. So far as documents go to show the intentions, and, indeed, the efforts, of both Governments, they had been, and still were, directed to the preservation of peace, and the security of neutrality. He trusted that those intentions would not be changed, and that those efforts would be continued; and that, if there were no laws now in existence to prevent breaches of neutrality on the part of our citizens, that such laws would be enacted. He hoped we were on the eve of no such war. He believed we were not; but that, on the contrary, the country was still preserving, and inclined to preserve, the most lofty grounds in the preservation of neutrality. He knew of no differences existing between this Government and Great Britain, excepting only that arising out of the position of the northeastern boundary question. Perhaps, said Mr. H. this may be thought, by some, to be a favorable opportunity to press that subject upon Great Britain; but it was not so, in his judgment.

Mr. H. again averred that he thought the country far from any danger of a war with Great Britain, and he trusted a large majority of the House agreed with him in this opinion. He remarked that the subject had been referred to a committee, (Foreign Affairs,) which would give it a serious and anxious consideration.

As to the inquiry proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fillmore,) in regard to the recent events upon the Niagara frontier, they were so very recent that Mr. H. doubted if any official information can have been received with regard to them. At all events, he was for keeping the information asked for from the Executive, in relation to this subject, and that regarding the Mexican question, distinct and separate. He was for keeping each by itself. He was opposed to both the amendments proposed.

Mr. ADAMS regretted that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs had thought it necessary to oppose the adoption of his amendment, and that proposed by the gentleman from New York. Without intending to misrepresent him, the gentleman (Mr. H.) had imputed to him language he had not used. He had not said that he thought the country on the eve of war with Great Britain. He had said that he viewed the nation as in imminent danger of such a war, which was quite another statement; and he hoped that what the House would now do, and what the Executive would also do, in consequence of the proposed action of the House, would avert that danger.

The gentleman from Maryland had said that he had now no control over the resolution he had reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that he was not authorized to assent to the proposed amendments. That (Mr. A. said) was undoubtedly true; but it was also as true that he was not authorized by that committee to oppose such amendments. He opposed them, if at all, upon his own personal and individual responsibility; and it was upon that ground that he (Mr. A.) was replying to his objections against those amendments. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have no more dissented from these amendments than they have assented to them. It was, therefore, to be regretted that such opposition had been made to them by the chairman of that committee, and the more because the gentleman from New York (Mr. F.) and himself, (Mr. A.) who had offered them, do not belong to that majority in the House which, upon every occasion, are expected to "toe the mark" there. Sir, (said Mr. A.) we are likely soon to be called upon to "toe the mark" in matters upon which I hope in God we may not be divided by party lines. We are nearing, I fear, a state of things, when it will hardly do to reject propositions upon important matters, because they do not come from a particular side of this body.

The question for us to consider now is, whether these amendments of my friend from New York and myself are proper, in the present state of things, to be adopted, and not from what quarter of the House they may come. The resolution of the Committee on Foreign Affairs alludes to a single act of hostility on the part of an officer of our own Government against the Mexican Government, acknowledged afterwards to have been such by the subsequent conduct of that officer. I wish, and the gentleman from New York wishes, to go a little further in this inquiry for information. We desire to obtain from the President of the United States all the information in his possession as to the differences existing between Mexico and this Government, and between Great Britain and this Government; information, without which the House cannot possibly act advisedly and effectively. He had (he continued) offered his proposition before the Message of the President had been transmitted to the House, because he saw the necessity of obtaining all the information in possession of the Executive in relation to the differences existing between this nation and Mexico on the one side, and Great Britain on the other. This message had come in as a confirmation of the propriety and necessity of that step of his, referring, as the House would perceive it does, as well to our relations with Mexico, as to those with Great Britain, and touched upon our Northern as well as Southern dangers. And now all he asked was, that the representatives of the people should request of the President of the United States what is the actual situation of the country; what had been done, what was proposed to be done in relation to it; what was demanded on the one side, and what claimed on the other. He had hoped that a proposition so reasonable would have been permitted to pass without opposition. Some other rule should be observed, he remarked, in matters so momentous, than "toe the mark." The divisions of party should be broken up upon questions like these, and they who are not in the confidence of the Executive should be permitted to have an opportunity of doing their duty by their common country, as well as the chosen sect.

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, continued Mr. ADAMS, tells the gentleman from New York that if he will, for the present, purge his amendment of so much as relates to the subject-matters already treated of by the President of the United States, in the Message just read to the House, he would have no objection to it as it now stands, at the proper time, and in a distinct form. Now, does not that gentleman know that if the member from New York and myself were to forego this inquiry upon that suggestion, and the resolution were then to pass, the time would never come when we might bring up our propositions? Would we not both be declared out of order, were we to make such an attempt? And so we should be put off till, perhaps, some time in June next, while, in the midst of a war, with the candle burning at both ends, when our resolutions of inquiry might be, at least, "in order?" The information we demand is asked not alone for the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but for the members of this body—for their consideration and the basis of their action.

This Message, continued Mr. ADAMS, is a very important one. It demands men—it calls for the expenditure of money—for millions more to be added to the millions already lavished in the attempt to check Indian hostilities, and for a purpose rather more deeply important, he would remark, than the prevention of any Indian hostilities. A great increase of the army would become necessary to carry out the suggestions of the President. How great an increase, and how large an expenditure, he could not say; probably all this would be known when the desired information shall come from the Executive.

This message (continued Mr. ADAMS) says nothing on the subject of any violation of neutrality on the Canada side. Yet such a violation, and one of the grossest character, had actually taken place on that side, and admitted, as it appears, to be such, by the British officer himself.

Mr. A. said he thought it probable that this Message was prepared before the information which had just been laid before the House was received. Whether this be so or not, this House, as well as the Executive, have a part to take in the matter—a highly responsible and important part: a duty to perform, in seeing that a strict neutrality is observed on the part of this Government, and also that that neutrality be not violated on the other side to the extent of a single hair, without demanding and insisting upon the most perfect and full satisfaction.

He hoped that, if the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs does not feel himself authorized to accede to the proposed amendments of his resolution, the House will feel otherwise disposed, and take such order in relation to the subject as will not postpone the consideration of questions so important until it shall be too late for any practical good purposes.

After making such a modification of his amendment as to make it consistent with the original resolution,

Mr. FILLMORE said he could not conceive how his proposition could possibly tend to embarrass the action of the House upon the resolution offered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It was certainly very easy for the President to distinguish between the different kinds of information sought for by the different propositions. He had tried every other way to bring his proposition before the House, and could not present it in any form which would secure its immediate consideration, excepting that in which it now stood. For if it were offered as an independent resolution, it would take its place behind all others now on the Speaker's table. Its great importance would not permit him to expose it to such a risk, and he had, therefore, offered it in the form of an amendment to the original resolution of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in which shape he hoped it would pass.

As to the expression which he had used in relation to the disturbances of the Niagara frontier, that this country was on the eve of a war with Great Britain, perhaps it was too strong an expression. But certainly all the facts demonstrated that there was imminent danger of such a result. The citizens of the United States, while in the peaceful pursuit of their business, had been attacked by an armed force from a foreign nation, and a portion of the militia of the country is even now ordered out to repel such hostility.

He well knew that the spirit of the people on the United States side of that frontier would not permit them to stand tamely by, and witness such assaults. These were facts, vouched for by respectable citizens as true, and authentic; and he must ask if they were not such as to warrant the offering of such a proposition as he had moved. It makes no difference, he contended, whether one or one hundred miles of the territory of the United States has been invaded by the arms of a foreign nation; the jurisdiction of this country is co-extensive with the utmost limits of her territory. Even if the vessel which was attacked had been carrying munitions of war to the revolutionists on Navy Island, she was only liable, he contended, to be attacked while within the British lines. As it was, he agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) that there was scarcely a parallel to this act upon the pages of our history as a nation; and it was to suppose an absolute impossibility, for a moment to imagine that the people on that frontier will ever submit to the occurrence of such acts without complaint and redress. It was, therefore, in any view, highly important that the House should obtain all possible information upon a subject so important.

Mr. HAMER had no intention of entering into a discussion on the subject, but there were sentiments just expressed which, in his opinion, required some notice. It sounded very strangely in his ears for gentlemen to rise and declare, when any opposition was made to their measures, that it came from a majority of the House who were always required to toe the mark upon every question, while they who thus complained pretended that they were not influenced by any such feelings, or actuated by party motives. He could easily appreciate the feelings of those who thought they had been treated with injustice by the majority upon that floor; but he thought they ought at least, on some occasions, to be charitable enough to admit that the opposition from the other party was actuated by motives as pure and disinterested as their own.

He fully agreed with the gentleman (Mr. Howard) who had offered the resolution, in his objection to the proposed amendments. The general practice of the House would show, that in a resolution reported from a committee, the mover had no power of himself to accept a modification.

It had been contended that we were "on the eve of a war with Great Britain;" but, for his part, he could perceive no sign or indication of such an event. He did not believe there was the least danger of a rupture between the two countries, as each of them understood its interests too well to admit even the thought of such an occurrence. So convinced was he of this, that he had no hesitation in saying that, in the present state of things, a war between Great Britain and the United States would be the greatest calamity that could possibly befall the civilized world. It were folly to suppose that two great and free nations, cemented together by all the ties of language, interest, and blood, would suffer that harmony to be destroyed by the hare-brained rashness of a few people scattered along the frontier of Canada. It might just as reasonably be supposed that two individuals, who had subsisted together for years in the most intimate friendship, would quarrel over a slight difference between two of their children. If gentlemen would reflect, they would see that the true policy of the two Governments was to adopt wise measures to remedy the evil; and in that way all differences could be easily settled, without the remotest danger of involving the two countries in a bloody war, as had been anticipated.

He then recapitulated the incidents of the affair, as they appeared from the papers, and from the letters read to the House by Mr. FILLMORE, and contended that the attack was probably the rash act of a subaltern officer, who was sent to cut out the boat while on the Canada side, at Navy Island, and who transcended his orders, in making that attack after the boat was within the United States lines. He doubted whether there were any wounded persons on board the boat when she was sent (on fire) over the Falls, and repudiated the idea that any portion of the people of the British provinces could possibly have been guilty of an act so barbarous.

Mr. H. did not believe any occasion of war existed between this Government and that of Great Britain. British troops, he admitted, might have crossed disputed territory, or even over our acknowledged territory, to reach those who had violated our laws in carrying arms and other aid in favor of those with whom that country were at war; but even from that fact, allowing it to exist, it is not the necessary consequence that there should be a declaration of war on the part of the United States against Great Britain. He alluded to the law of nations, and to our own history, in proof of his assertion, and contended that the fact of a few troops passing over neutral ground for the purpose of reaching an enemy, was not necessarily a sufficient cause for making war.

He had no objection to either of the proposed amendments, provided they could be kept distinct, as he was perfectly willing for the House to receive all the information which could be obtained.

Mr. CILLEY adverted to the remarks of Mr. HOWARD, in relation to the mild and lofty course which that gentleman thought the Government, under existing circumstances, should pursue. Mr. C. could not agree with the gentleman in his recommendation for mild measures, when he took into consideration the aggravating conduct of Great Britain for many years past, in relation to the northeastern boundary of Maine. Mr. C. then took a review of that question, and entered into a detail of the circumstances attending it. He expatiated on the long forbearance of the people of Maine, and contended that the dispute was not owing to the boundary not being clearly defined, but to a desire of the British Government to obtain part of Maine, for the purpose of connecting their provinces.

Mr. C. proceeded to state that he would make a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, who had undertaken to apologize for the British, and to throw the whole blame of the steamboat attack at Niagara on an officer who had disobeyed orders.

Mr. HAMER wished to inform the gentleman, that in his allusions to that affair, he had not spoken on his own responsibility, but his remarks were founded on the information contained in the letters read by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fillmore.)

Mr. CILLEY was sorry he had misunderstood the gentleman; but what had the British done on the borders of his State—Maine? Had they not, times without number, arrested American citizens, and put them in prison? The people of Maine had borne it, because they were desirous of preserving peace; but none but themselves could form any idea of what they had to suffer. They would bear it as long as they could; but gentlemen might depend upon it, that they would not submit to further aggression, but would resist to the utmost, until British tyranny should cease from the land. He was willing to go as far as any gentleman to invest the Government with power to preserve neutrality, but nothing on earth could make him suppress his feelings for the sons of liberty, when they were struggling in a just cause. It was the duty of Government, in the first place, to aseertain that they were right, and having determined that, it was also their duty to follow up its measures with proper courage. If their cause was a just one, they ought to proceed; and no matter if the fires of war did burst out at both ends of the country at once, they were abundantly able to blow it out.

Mr. BRONSON alluded to the defenceless state of the northern frontier, owing to the military troops having been drawn away for the purpose of prosecuting the war in Florida. He considered that troops at this time were as necessary for the protection of the northern frontier as they were in Florida; but, at the same time, he deprecated such remarks as that we were upon the eve of a war with Great Britain. He trusted that the good understanding between the two countries would continue to exist, and that the existing difficulties would be speedily settled by the adoption of prudent measures. He would, however, call the attention of the House to the true state of that frontier. The recent ebullition of feeling and excitement, was but a speck compared with what was continually going on in all the provinces, and along the whole line.

Mr. B. then adverted to the fact of 1,000 or 1,500 men, probably mostly from the American side, having entrenched themselves on Navy Island, under the command of an individual of high family in the city of Albany, and undergoing the strictest discipline. Also to the circumstance of arms having been taken almost openly from the armories, and the high state of feeling along the whole line as far as Plattsburg, as all the gentlemen from Vermont were perfectly acquainted.

Mr. B. proceeded to show the state of the public mind in Canada. He said that since the recent occurrences had taken place, the regular exchanges between our newspapers and those of Canada had been stopped; but from a few Canadian papers brought over the lines, and which had been forwarded to him, it was very evident that the tone of the people of Canada could not be mistaken. Mr. B. then read several extracts from the papers; after which he said it would be evident to the House that the amendments ought to be adopted, as it was of the highest importance that all possible information should be obtained. He also wished to call the attention of the House to another important subject, viz: that of the increase of the army. The military posts of the country had been stripped for the purpose of sending the forces to Florida, and the department was now unable to send troops to the North, for the simple reason that there were none to send. He urged on them the necessity of adopting speedy and decisive measures to preserve neutrality, as well as to protect our citizens from aggression.

Mr. HOWARD would repeat what he had before said, that it was not his intention to oppose the amendments calling for information, but to separate them. He did not, as an individual, feel himself at liberty to assent to any modification of a resolution reported, through him, by the committee; but the subject had been referred to that committee, and he could not believe that, when they reported to the House, they would keep back a single particle of information which might be necessary to the formation of their judgment. It was well known that, when the Committee on Foreign Relations presented any measure, they threw open every avenue of information. His wish was to keep the several calls for information distinct, as no benefit could arise from trammelling one with another.

If the gentleman from Maine had understood him to say that he admitted any doubt as to the territory in dispute, he must have expressed himself very imperfectly. He would take that opportunity to state that he had examined that subject for many years, and had come to the conclusion that the claim of the State of Maine was established and sustained on every ground, and that he saw no legal title in the British Government. But he would ask, now that the subject had remained unsettled for upwards of twenty-five years, would it not appear ungenerous to press the subject when Great Britain was involved in domestic troubles of her own. Would not the nations of Europe infer that such an act was a proof of our weakness, in seizing on such a moment of embarrassment to obtain that which we had sought in vain for a whole generation? Were an individual, having a quarrel with another which he had failed to prosecute for years, to rush upon his enemy when he was attacked by a third person, it would be esteemed an unmanly and cowardly act. Therefore, as we had suffered the affair to lie dormant so long, he trusted that, under the present peculiar circumstances, it would not be pressed. Yet he coincided fully with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fillmore,) that the Government of the United States ought to protect our frontier, and he trusted that the interest and honor of the nation would be guarded with the greatest zeal, and if it should be proved that aggressions had been made, he was convinced that the legislative and executive powers would not express the will of the people if they did not insist on reparation.

Mr. SIBLEY, when reviewing our present position, was convinced that peace could not long remain, unless more energetic measures were adopted. He had felt afraid that the Executive had not adopted such measures as the laws now existing placed in his power. But if, after all those means had been tried and found ineffectual, he would then be willing to grant additional power.

Mr. PATTON, although he believed the fears of the gentlemen who had offered the amendments to be wholly unfounded, thought that much time might be saved, and the end attained, by further amending the resolution, so as to call on the President to furnish information on the various propositions in separate communications.

Mr. FILLMORE had no objection to accept of the amendment; but before he took his seat, he would state that the charge of arms having been taken from the public arsenals, was a mistake. It was true that a quantity of arms had been taken from Buffalo, but not from any of the arsenals.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. CUSHING and F. O. J. SMITH, the amendments of Messrs. FILLMORE and ADAMS were severally agreed to; and the question recurring on the original resolution as amended, it was adopted.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the statements of the incorporated banks of the District of Columbia; which, on motion of Mr. HAYNES, was refered to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Also, a statement from the Secretary of State of the number of, and compensation to, the clerks in that department; which, on motion of Mr. HAYNES, was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. RENCHER, it was Ordered, That when the House adjourn this day, it adjourn to meet on Monday; and then, on motion,

The House adjourned.

The following petitions, presented on Tuesday last, were accidentally omitted in the proceedings of that day:

Mr. BRODHEAD of New York presented a petition of Einathan Sears, of Sullivan county, New York, for additional pension. Also, a petition of Henry Muskeneaugh, of the county of Ulster, New York, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Also, a petition of 44 legal voters of the county of Ulster, New York, to abolish slavery in the Territories of the United States, and especially in the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, on his motion. Also, a petition of 33 legal voters of the town of Plattahill, New York, not to admit any new State into the Union the Constitution of which tolerates domestic slavery.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, January 5, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN presented the petition of citizens of Philadelphia, relative to the completion of the frigate Raritan: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DISTURBANCES ON THE NORTHERN FRONTIER.

The CHAIR communicated the following message from the President of the United States, on the subject of the war in Canada:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

Recent experience on the southern boundary of the United States, and the events now daily occurring on our northern frontier, have abundantly shown that the existing laws are insufficient to guard against hostile invasion, from the United States, of the territory of friendly and neighboring nations.

The laws in force provide sufficient penalties for the punishment of such offences, after they have been committed, and provided the parties can be found; but the Executive is powerless in many cases to prevent the commission of them, even when in possession of ample evidence of an intention on the part of evil-disposed persons to violate our laws.

Your attention is called to this defect in our legislation. It is apparent that the Executive ought to be clothed with adequate power effectually to restrain all persons within our jurisdiction from the commission of acts of this character. They tend to disturb the peace of the country, and inevitably involve the Government in perplexing controversies with foreign powers. I recommend a careful revision of all the laws now in force, and such additional enactments as may be necessary to vest in the Executive full power to prevent injuries being inflicted upon neighboring nations by the unauthorized and unlawful acts of citizens of the United States, or of other persons who may be within our jurisdiction, and subject to our control.

In illustration of these views, and to show the necessity of an early action on the part of Congress, I submit herewith a copy of a letter received from the Marshal of the northern district of New York, who had been directed to repair to the frontier, and take all authorized measures to secure the faithful execution of existing laws.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, January 5, 1838.

The message, with the accompanying papers, having been read by the Secretary—

Mr. CLAY rose to express his full conviction of the necessity of some early action on this important subject. No spectacle could be more revolting to the feelings of a free people, than a war either among themselves or with another country. The views of the Executive met his highest approbation, but it was the duty of Congress to examine, and, if the existing laws were not adequate to prevent the alleged interference of our citizens, others should be forthwith enacted for the full accomplishment of an object so desirable. Mr. C. adverted, in connection, to the vexatious and unsettled state of our Northern boundary, which state of things tended to increase the danger which now threatened us. He had witnessed a similar course of policy on the part of our citizens during recent occurrences of a similar character in another quarter; on which subject, however, he had never expressed his opinion, nor should he do so now.

If the people of this country choose to renounce their citizenship, it was perhaps allowable; but any interference with a rebellion in a country with which we were at peace, should meet the earliest attention of our Government. We might, as citizens, freely, and in any manner we thought proper, express our sympathies with either belligerent party, but in no case lend them aid or countenance. He did not consider he had any right to express an opinion relative to the course of the Canadians. They might be right, or they might be wrong, in the course they were pursuing. It was the duty of every citizen to remain quiet, nor even express opinions, till such expression had been made by the Government.

He hoped that to whatever committee the subject might be referred, they would examine with the greatest care and strictest scrutiny the question on both sides. Examine whether or not the action of our citizens had not been limited to some disputed territory, or whether arms, munitions of war, or supplies, had been furnished, and which, if proved true, such conduct must be viewed by Government as in the highest degree reprehensible.

He would express no opinion, nor make a motion as to the reference, but should think that either the Committee on the Judiciary or on Foreign Affairs the most appropriate.

Mr. CALHOUN had felt from the beginning of the troubles in Canada the greatest anxiety, and a fear that it might result in difficulties to this country. He hoped the existing laws, prohibiting the interference of our citizens, would be rigidly enforced; and if, on examination, they should be found insufficient to meet the exigencies of the case, that new ones would be speedily enacted. He would set forth in the strongest light the terrible consequences of a war with Great Britain at the present time.

He urged, in the most emphatic manner, the necessity of clothing the Executive with all needful additional power, if the laws in force were in this respect too limited. He moved the reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NORVELL said that no portion of the people of the United States were more deeply interested in this subject than the inhabitants of the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent. Between a part of that State, and the Upper Province of Canada, there was a river, the dividing line, only of one mile wide. The peace of our citizens in that quarter was daily and hourly exposed to violation in the progress of this civil war in the adjacent Province. Persons belonging to both of the parties in this foreign contest would seek refuge, sympathy and aid from our people, among whom there might be individuals disposed to jeopard the neutrality and peace of the country, in their anxiety to strengthen the cause which they espoused. It was exceedingly desirable that this should, if possible, be prevented. Our own rights and liberties were too precious to be jeoparded in those premature and badly digested civil broils between different portions of the same foreign people. The honorable Senator from Kentucky had expressed the proper sentiment on this subject. But Mr. N. had only risen to express his earnest solicitude, that to whatever Committee the Executive message might be referred, an early and prompt report would be made. He only regretted that in other and previous cases of beligerent controversies between different portions of other foreign States, an equally rigid course of neutrality had not been pursued. He knew that, so far as the Executive had been concerned, all its means had been exerted to preserve our neutral position. But the laws were inadequate to the object, and ought to be revised and made stronger.

Mr. DAVIS most heartily concurred with the sentiments of the Senators who had preceded him, and also in the views of the Executive, on this momentous subject. Congress, he considered, were under the most sacred obligations to preserve the present pacific relations between ourselves and foreign powers. It was a duty we owed to ourselves and to other nations, to preserve to the utmost, obedience to the treaties existing, and to enforce rigidly their observance on the part of our citizens with such nations, while with them we continue at peace.

It seemed to him there had been too long manifested by our citizens a disposition to interfere with the affairs of our neighbors of the frontiers, and it would appear that the efforts of those whose duty it was to enforce the laws had urged on and encouraged such measures, rather than laboring to suppress them. He had no opinions to express relative to these facts, as connected with recent difficulties on our southern border, or in the affairs of Canada. It was a matter of deep regret that the Government had not more strictly enforced this duty, and equally did he regret that the attention of Congress had not been earlier called to the subject.

Some definite and decisive measures had now become necessary, in order effectually to preserve our good faith and character as a nation. If the Executive power was not strong enough, by all means enlarge it, by enacting new laws on the subject. Of all evils that could now befall this nation, the most deplorable in its effects would be a war with Great Britain.

We all well know the strength and power of that country, and equally well we know that our progress, improvement, and success, is but a growing weakness. He would express his thanks to the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) for having made mention of our unhappy differences relative to the settlement of our northeastern boundary. He contended that it was more forcibly evident that our Government had too long slumbered and slept on this subject. Our difficulties would now, on this score, be greatly augmented. In entering into an investigation on the subject directly before Congress, it became also their imperative duty to investigate this matter also. It was due to the country to know whether Great Britain does or does not make practical use of this disputed territory. Whether, if there are not really roads and regular mails established throughout, it is not made of practical utility; and if, over this same district, there have not been transmitted troops, munitions of war, and supplies of provisions, for the use of their forces. It is not to inquire, at this time, if she has occupied the territory by a civil force or jurisdiction, but if she has no further made use of it than to carry troops across, her point is gained. It is all the privilege the Government of Great Britain would ask of us. It is all she wants. The territory is to her not worth having, except for such practical purposes.

After some remarks by Mr. BENTON in favor of the motion to commit, the documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MERRICK, the Senator elect from Maryland, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of James Miller, to be indemnified for the loss of his plantation in the Florida war: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BENTON introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of General William Eaton: read and ordered to be printed.

Also, a bill providing for the uniform payment for horses lost in the United States military service: ordered to a second reading.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of ——— Hoben.

Bill for the relief of Eli Horton.

Bill for the relief of Benjamin Morse.

Bill for the relief of Francis Gardner;

Bill for the relief of John M. Holland;

Which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Jonathan Davis: ordered, with the report, to be printed.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill explanatory of an act establishing the pay of brevet officers: ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NORVELL gave notice, that to-morrow he should ask leave to introduce a bill supplementary to the "act to provide for the adjustment of titles of land in the town of Detroit and Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes;" and a bill for the relief of Augustus A. Nicholson.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Mackinac to the Sault Ste Marie, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial from the Mayor, Recorder, and Aldermen, of the city of Detroit, praying for the passage of a bill supplementary to the "Act to provide for the adjustment of titles to land in the town of Detroit, and Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes:" referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. N. also presented a memorial from sundry inhabitants of the State of Michigan, praying for an appropriation to improve the harbor of Port Sheldon, at the mouth of Pigeon river, on Lake Michigan: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. N. also presented a petition from Francis Cicotte, of the county of Wayne, State of Michigan, praying a grant of land: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill accompanied by a special report for the relief of Mary A. Kirkpatrick: read, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WALKER,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of extending certain post routes in Mississippi.

Also, from same committee, reporting adverse to the petition of James Allen: adopted.

Also, from same commitee, reporting adverse to the petition of the Union Bank of Georgetown, for compensation for money lost at the Baltimore Post Office; which report was, on motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, laid over for one day.

Mr. PRESTON from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to amend the act of 1828, establishing the pay of brevet officers: ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported adverse to the petition of John Lute and another, for compensation for money lost by transmission by mail.

Mr. CLAY desired to know of the Committee whether they had examined the facts relative to the money being transmitted by mail, and lost while in charge of, and through neglect of the agents of the Department.

Mr. ROBINSON replied that the Committee had no evidence brought before them except such as was furnished simply by the memorials themselves. It was true, it had come to their knowledge indirectly, that some editor of a newspaper of Baltimore had been privileged to enter the post office in that place, and had been found guilty of robbing the mail, and was now suffering due punishment for the offence; yet there was no proof that the money alleged to have been lost was among that which was purloined at the time.

Mr. CLAY admitted that the legal conclusions of the committee were perfectly correct, yet he wished that the inquiry into the matter might not stop here. It was a subject which interested the citizens of every section of the country. It was understood to be the practice in many places to admit certain persons into the offices, and to examine the contents of the mail. Such admissions on the part of postmasters he thought highly reprehensible. He wished to inquire to what extent the practice was carried. It was a good opportunity to make a thorough investigation of the matter. For any individual to be permitted to break open the mails, and handle the letters and other contents, was contrary to the spirit of the institution, and should receive the strict scrutiny of Congress.

Mr. C. wished also to inquire whether the particular case in question had been investigated by the Postmaster General?

Mr. ROBINSON replied, that he understood the whole matter had received a thorough investigation by that officer.

Mr. CLAY then moved that the report be laid on the table; which motion was agreed to.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, adverse to the petition of Nathan Gunnison, was adopted.

A report from the Secretary of State, relative to the number and salaries of clerks employed in that department; also, from the Treasury Department, stating the condition of the banks of the District of Columbia; also, from the War Department, relative to a survey of Owls Head and other harbors, in Maine: severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, the resolutions offered by him yesterday relative to the annexation of Texas to the United States, were taken up; and he moved that the consideration thereof be made the special order of the day for Tuesday week next.

Some objection to the motion being made by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama and MORRIS,

A motion fixing on the first Monday of February for that purpose was agreed to.

The consideration of Mr. CALHOUN'S resolutions on the subject of abolition was resumed. A discussion thereon was continued till a late hour, without taking a vote on any question except the adoption, offered by Mr. ALLEN, of an amendment to an amendment to the third resolution offered yesterday by Mr. SMITH of Indiana. This amendment was adopted—yeas 32, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Strange, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young —32.

When, on motion of Mr. CLAY,

The Senate adjourned.

[On Wednesday, Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial from sundry inhabitants of the county of Berrien, State of Michigan, praying for the passage of a general pre-emption law. The memorial was, on the motion of the same Senator, ordered to be printed.]

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, Jan. 6, 1838.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of citizens of Mississippi for alterations in the mail routes: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of W. A. Davis, offering to the Government certain copies of the United States Laws: ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL introduced a bill supplementary to an act providing for the adjustment of land claims in the town of Detroit and Territory of Michigan: read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. M'KEAN said he hoped, in these times of extraordinary resolutions, it would not be thought presumptuous in him to offer some small evidence that even he, humble as he was, was not wholly irresolute; he therefore proposed to lay the resolutions which he held in his hand, on the table, to come up in their order:

1. Resolved, That Congress possess no power under the Constitution to abolish slavery where it exists in any of the States of this Union.

2. Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at this time, to legislate on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, the petition of James Smulley for relief, on which the Committee on Military Affairs had reported adversely, was recommitted to the same committee.

Mr. ROBBINS introduced the resolutions of the General Assembly of Rhode Island, etc. remonstrating against the admission of Texas into the Union of the United States: laid on the table.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Philip Legare, accompanied by a report: read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN gave notice that he should, on Monday, introduce a bill to repeal duties on certain imports.

On motion of Mr. HUBRARD,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate compile or cause to be printed for the use of the Senate an alphabetical list of all the petitions for private claims which have been presented for the last twenty years, with the action of the Senate on each.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS,

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Navy cause to be printed an edition of two thousand copies of the report embracing Professor Hassler's survey of the coast, for the use of Government and for distribution.

On motion of Mr. WALL,

Ordered, That the papers relating to a certain survey of Prince's and other bays, be taken from the files and referred.

The consideration of Mr. CALHOUN'S resolutions was then resumed.

Mr. MORRIS spoke at length in favor an amendment offered by him on the amendment proposed by Mr. ALLEN to the third resolution. This amendment was rejected by a vote, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Knight, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Swift and Webster—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, White, Williams, Wright and Young—32.

Messrs. NORVELL and SEVIER subsequently came in, and asked leave to record their votes, which was objected to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of Mr. SMITH'S amendment, as amended by Mr. ALLEN, and rejected, with an understanding that it was to be offered and appended to the resolutions after their passage, and which reads as follows:

"That nothing in the foregoing resolutions is intended to recognise the right of Congress to impair, in any manner, the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of petition, as secured by the Constitution to the citizens of the several States, within the States respectively."

After some further discussion on the adoption of the third resolution as amended—

Mr. BAYARD proposed to further amend it, by striking out the words "several States of this Union," and to insert from the Constitution,

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

25TH CONG.....2ND SESS. MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1838. VOLUME 6.....No. 6.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

"The people of the United States," on which question he asked the yeas and nays, when there appeared for it 8, against it 34, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Davis, Knight, Prentiss, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, and Webster—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—34.

On taking the question on the adoption of the third resolution, the vote resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Davis, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, and Webster—11.

Mr. PRESTON moved that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to Tuesday next, which was carried.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business, and afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, Jan. 8, 1838.

The following message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, Esq.

To the Senate and House of Representatives, United States.

In the highly excited state of feeling on the northern frontier, occasioned by the disturbances in Canada, it was to be apprehended that causes of complaint might arise on the line dividing the United States from her Britannic Majesty's dominions. Every precaution was therefore taken on our part authorized by the existing laws, and as the troops of the provinces were embodied on the Canadian side, it was hoped that no serious violation of the rights of the United States would be permitted to occur. I regret, however, to inform you that an outrage of a most aggravated character has been committed, accompanied by a hostile though temporary invasion of our territory, producing the strongest feelings of resentment on the part of our citizens in the neighborhood, and in the whole border line, and that the excitement previously existing has been alarmingly increased. To guard against the possible recurrence of any similar act, I have thought it indispensable to call out a portion of the militia to be posted on that frontier. The documents herewith presented to Congress, show the character of the outrage committed, the measures taken in consequence of its occurrence, and the necessity for resorting to them.

It will also be seen that the subject was immediately brought to the notice of the British minister accredited to this country, and the proper steps taken on our part to obtain the fullest information of all the circumstances leading to and attendant upon the transaction, preparatory to a demand for reparation. I ask such appropriations as the circumstances in which our country is thus unexpectedly placed require.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8, 1838.

Mr. Rogers to the President.

BUFFALO, Dec. 30, 1837.

SIR: Enclosed are copies of affidavits which I have prepared in great haste, and which contain all that is material in relation to the gross and extraordinary transaction to which they relate. Our whole frontier is in commotion, and I fear it will be difficult to restrain our citizens from revenging, by a resort to arms, this flagrant invasion of our territory. Every thing that can be done will be by the public authorities to prevent so injudicious a movement. The respective sheriffs of Erie and Niagara have taken the responsibility of calling out the militia, to guard the frontier, and prevent any further depredations.

I am, sir, with great consideration,

Your obedient servant,

H. W. ROGERS,

District Attorney for Erie county, and acting for the U. S.

To his Excellency M. VAN BUREN,

President of the United States.

STATE OF NEW YORK, Niagara county, ss.

Gilman Appleby, of the city of Buffalo, being sworn, says, that he left the port of Buffalo on the morning of the 29th instant, in the steamboat Caroline, owned by William Wells, of Buffalo, and bound for Schlosser, upon the east side of the Niagara river, and within the United States. That this deponent commanded the said Caroline, and that she was cleared from Buffalo with a view to run between said Buffalo and Schlosser, carry passengers, freight, etc. That this deponent caused the said Caroline to be landed at Black Rock, on her way down; and that, while at Black Rock, this deponent caused the American flag to be run up; and that, soon after leaving Black Rock harbor, a volley of musketry was discharged at the Caroline from the Canada shore, but without injury. That the said Caroline continued her course down the Niagara river unmolested, and landed outside of certain scows or boats attached to Navy Island, where a number of passengers disembarked, and, as this deponent supposes, certain articles of freight were landed. That from this point the Caroline ran to Schlosser, arriving there at three o'clock in the afternoon; that, between this time and dark, the Caroline made two trips to Navy Island, landing as before. That, at about six o'clock in the evening, this deponent caused the said Caroline to be landed at Schlosser, and made fast with chains to the dock at that place. That the crew and officers of the Caroline numbered ten, and that, in the course of the evening, twenty-three individuals, all of whom were citizens of the United States, came on board of the Caroline, and requested this deponent and other officers of the boat to permit them to remain on board during the night, as they were unable to get lodgings at the tavern near by; these requests were acceded to, and the persons thus coming on board retired to rest, as did also all of the crew and officers of the Caroline, except such as were stationed to watch during the night. That about midnight, this deponent was informed by one of the watch that several boats filled with men were making towards the Caroline from the river, and this deponent immediately gave the alarm, and before he was able to reach the deck the Caroline was boarded by some seventy or eighty men, all of whom were armed. That they immediately commenced a warfare with muskets, swords, and cutlasses, upon the defenceless crew and passengers of the Caroline under a fierce cry of "G—d damn them, give them no quarters; kill every man; fire! fire!" That the Caroline was abandoned without resistance, and the only effort made by either the crew or passengers seemed to be to escape slaughter. That this deponent narrowly escaped; having received several wounds, none of which, however, are of a serious character. That immediately after the Caroline fell into the hands of the armed force who boarded her, she was set on fire, cut loose from the dock, was towed into the current of the river, there abandoned, and soon after descended the Niagara Falls; that this deponent has made vigilant search after the individuals, thirty-three in number, who are known to have been on the Caroline at the time she was boarded, and twenty-one only are to be found, one of whom, to wit, Amos Durfee, of Buffalo, was found dead upon the dock, having received a shot from a musket, the ball of which penetrated the back part of the head, and came out at the forehead. James H. King and Captain C. F. Harding were seriously, though not mortally wounded. Several others received slight wounds. The twelve individuals who are missing, this deponent has no doubt were either murdered upon the steamboat, or found a watery grave in the cataract of the falls. And this deponent further says, that immediately after the Caroline was got into the current of the stream and abandoned, as before stated, beacon lights were discovered upon the Canada shore, near Chippewa; and after sufficient time had elapsed to enable the boats to reach that shore, this deponent distinctly heard loud and vociferous cheering at that point. That this deponent has no doubt that the individuals who boarded the Caroline were a part of the British forces now stationed at Chippewa.

Mr. Poinsett to Gen. Scott.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,

January 5, 1838.

SIR: You will repair, without delay, to the Canada frontier of the United States, and assume the military command there.

Herewith you will receive duplicate letters to the Governors of the States of New York and Vermont, requesting them to call into the service of the United States such a militia force as you may deem necessary for the defence of that frontier of the United States.

This power has been confided to you in the full persuasion that you will use it discreetly, and extend the call only so far as circumstances may seem to require.

It is important that the troops called into the service should be, if possible, exempt from that state of excitement which the late violation of our territory has created, and you will therefore impress upon the Governors of these border States the propriety of selecting troops from a portion of the State distant from the theatre of action.

The Executive possesses no legal authority to employ the military force to restrain persons within our jurisdiction, and who ought to be under our control, from violating the laws, by making incursions into the territory of neighboring and friendly nations, with hostile intent. I can give you, therefore, no instructions on that subject; but request that you will use your influence to prevent such excesses, and to preserve the character of this Government for good faith and a proper regard for the rights of friendly powers.

The militia will be called into the service for three months, unless sooner discharged; and in your requisitions you will designate the number of men, and take care that the officers do not exceed a due proportion.

It is deemed important that the administrative branch of the service should be conducted, wherever practicable, by officers of the regular army.

The disposition of the force, with regard to the points to be occupied, is confided to your discretion, military skill, and intimate knowledge of the country; and the amount of that force must depend upon the character and duration of the contest now going on in Canada, and the disposition manifested by the people and the public authorities of that colony.

The President indulges a hope that outrages, similar to that which lately occurred at Schlosser, will not be repeated; and that you will be able to maintain the peace of that frontier without being called upon to use the force which has been confided to you.

Very respectfully,
Your most obedient servant,
(Signed) J. R. POINSETT.
Bvt. Maj. Gen. WINFIELD SCOTT,
Washington City.

Mr. Poinsett to Gov. Marcy.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
January 5, 1838.

SIR: The territory of the United States having been violated by a party of armed men from the Canada shore, and apprehensions being entertained, from the highly excited feelings of both parties, that similar outrages may lead to an invasion of our soil, the President has thought proper to exercise the authority vested in him by law, and call out such a militia force as may be deemed necessary to protect the frontiers of the United States

I am, in consequence, instructed by the President to request you will cause into the service of the United States, and place under the command of Brevet Major General Scott, such militia force as he may require to be employed on the Canada frontier, for the purpose herein set forth.

Very respectfully,
Your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.
His Excellency W. L. MARCY,
Governor of N. Y. Albany, N. Y.
[Same to his Excellency, SILAS H. JENNISON, Governor of Vermont, Montpelier, Vermont.]

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Jan. 5, 1838.

SIR: By the direction of the President of the United States, I have the honor to communicate to you a copy of the evidence furnished to this Department of an extraordinary outrage committed from Her Britannic Majesty's province of Upper Canada, on the persons and property of citizens of the United States, within the jurisdiction of the State of New York. The destruction of the property, and assassination of citizens of the United States on the soil of New York, at the moment when, as is well known to you, the President was anxiously endeavoring to allay the excitement, and earnestly seeking to prevent any unfortunate occurrence on the frontier of Canada, has produced upon his mind the most painful emotions of surprise and regret. It will necessarily form the subject of a demand for redress upon Her Majesty's Government. This communication is made to you under the expectation that, through your instrumentality, an early explanation may be obtained from the authorities of Upper Canada of all the circumstances of the transaction; and that, by your advice to those authorities, such decisive precautions may be used as will render the perpetration of similar acts hereafter impossible. Not doubting the disposition of the Government of Upper Canada to do its duty in punishing the aggressors and preventing future outrage, the President, notwithstanding, has deemed it necessary to order a sufficient force on the frontier to repel any attempt of a like character, and to make known to you that if it should occur, he cannot be answerable for the effects of the indignation of the neighboring People of the United States.

I take this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

To HENRY S. FOX, Esq. &c. &c.

The message having been read,

Mr. HOWARD said that seeing the President, in the conclusion of the Message, called for an appropriation, he should move its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, otherwise he should have moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He also took that opportunity to inform the House that the Committee on Foreign Affairs held a meeting on Saturday, and again this morning, on the message referred to them on Friday, but that they were not, as yet, prepared to report any measures.

Mr. DE GRAFF called for the reading of the accompanying documents, which was ordered; and the same having been read—

Mr. FILLMORE inquired of the Chair if the message just read was in response to the resolution making a call for information on the subject of Canada on Friday last?

The CHAIR replied that nothing appeared in that document to induce the belief that it was.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that so much of the Message as related to the call for appropriations be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and the residue thereof to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. T. said he had no special preference between those committees; but it was a matter of infinite importance that so weighty a subject should be referred to the different committees selected with a view to the particular subjects to be brought up to their consideration. He said that it became the House to be cautious and guarded in the extreme, for no man could tell the extremities to which he might be disposed to go, if he suffered his private feelings to prevail on this most outrageous and barbarous massacre. He had confidence that the matter would be properly conducted by the Federal Executive, though he must say that he looked upon the letter of Mr. Forsyth as altogether too vague. The act referred to was a murder—a foul, wilful, deliberate, unmitigated murder, He was as sensible as any man of the tremendous consequences of a war between this country and Great Britain. The history of he world did not present such; but still there were circumstances in this instance that demanded the fullest atonement.

Mr. CAMBRELENG should not, in the present position of this question, go into any debate on the possibility or probability of a war between this country and Great Britain, or on the very atrocious circumstances now disclosed, for he considered that it would be premature; but he rose to suggest to the gentleman from Maryland to adopt the modification of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HOWARD assented to the suggestion, and so modified his motion.

Mr. HAYNES said that he should not say one word on the present occasion, had it not been for the remarks of his honorable friend from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson.) He stood here the defender and apologist of no man. But he was sure, when the Secretary of State characterized the outrage referred to as assassination, and demanded the punishment of its perpetrators, he had used no vague language.

Mr. GRAY called for the reading of Speaker McNabb's letter to Mr. Rogers, the District Attorney at Buffalo, dated Dec. 29, 1837, disclaiming any intention to infringe the neutrality, which was done.

Mr. FILLMORE insisted that that letter was only in relation to Grand Island, and was no disclaimer of the particular act referred to, since it was written before these outrages.

Mr. GRAY did not rise for the purpose of excusing the deed which was said to have been done, but he was opposed to any course during the present state of things which would have the least tendency to place us in a warlike position with Great Britain. He thought it the duty of gentlemen to investigate the facts calmly, before they expressed themselves so warmly, more especially at this particular period, when we were engaged in a war on the southern frontier.

Mr. TILLINGHAST thought it extremely important that the feeling of excitement in the North should not be further excited by discussions in that Hall. If such a course were pursued, the people would in all probability be misled, and infer that something ought to be done. But he thought it impossible that gentlemen should, with all the information before them, suppose that there was any more danger of war now than there was before the occurrences in question took place. No gentleman knowing the high and liberal policy of Great Britain could suppose that she would refuse to discountenance and deliver up those murderers, provided the facts alleged were properly established. He felt persuaded that she would never sanction such acts committed by her subjects, but, at the same time, he considered it highly necessary that our citizens on the frontier ought to be protected from such attacks, and not to be left defenceless. He hoped that troops would be sent on immediately to preserve the peace, and to prevent a retaliation from our own people, if possible, still more violent. But, said Mr. T. this state of things ought to have been foreseen more than a month ago, and measures provided accordingly. Yet the Executive had not done so; the troops had been withdrawn to another extremity of the Union, and the upper coasts left entirely unprotected; the people might take arms from the public arsenals, or pursue any other lawless course, without the least check upon them. But now matters had assumed such an aspect, and the subject come up in proper form, he was in favor referring so much of it as required an appropriation to the Committee of Ways and Means, and the residue to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRONSON regretted to see that there was a greater disposition to make war on the Administration than on Great Britain. He was as much averse to a war with Great Britain as any one, but he could not restrain his surprise that gentlemen should come forward and throw the whole blame of the recent occurrences upon the Administration. He would ask if the Administration had not done all that was possible it could do under all the circumstances of the case? Was the Administration to be blamed for the peculiar situation of that portion of our frontier, and because a party from the other side had come over and murdered a number of our citizens? He contended, that until within the last thirty days there were no indications in that quarter which would authorize the Executive to adopt such measures as were now necessary. Although there were disturbances in a distant portion of Canada, yet, until very recently, peace reigned along the whole frontier; and there was no more reason to apprehend that troops would be required there, than that they would be wanted on this side of the Potomac.

It was true that the military posts had been stripped, but had not the troops been sent to protect our southern and southwestern frontier; and was there any reason in time of peace that those garrisons in the north should be filled with troops, when their services were required in another quarter? Since the disturbances on the Canadian frontier had broken out, it had been impossible in the nature of things to withdraw the troops from Florida, but the Executive had done all it was able to do in affording protection to the northern frontier, and he could scarcely conceive why gentlemen should be so ready to charge the Administration with neglect, when, if they would but reflect on the facts, they would see that the Department had done all in its power. He must certainly say, that the charge appeared quite gratuitous.

The gentleman from South Carolina had spoken of "the tameness of the Secretary of State;" but he would ask that gentleman whether it would not be well to restrain such expressions until all the facts of the case should be known? It might be that the people and the Government of the United States were in "glass houses" in this case. Suppose it. Suppose it should turn out that 1,000 or 1,500 men, most of them American citizens, had located themselves on an island in a foreign territory, furnished with arms and ammunition from the State of New York, and aiding a rebellion of the lawful subjects of a foreign power—suppose it should turn out that the steamboat Caroline had been employed in transporting arms and men from our own frontier to the island in question, and that at the time of the outrage, it was employed for that purpose? He imagined if these things should be proved, gentlemen would not be quite so ready to express themselves so warmly on the subject. He (Mr. B.) did not intend by that to justify the act so justly complained of; the attack on the steamboat must be looked upon by all as a most horrible and violent outrage, sufficient to make the blood of any man tingle to his finger ends; but still it was possible there might be some little apology for the outbreak of passion of the Canadian troops, owing to the treatment they have previously received. He therefore desired a proper investigation of the subject, and he approved of the motion to refer it to appropriate committees.

Mr. RHETT deprecated any premature expression of opinion on the subject. He thought the House should, in the first place, look at the matter calmly, and ascertain who was to blame. One gentleman had said that it was the fault of the Administration, another gentleman had laid it all on Great Britain, while others had taken a different view. Under these circumstances, he considered it highly important that it should be carefully investigated, and ascertained where the blame really lay. Was it with the Administration? Candor, certainly, would declare not, whilst not a regular soldier was available at its command; and the civil officers on the frontier, who had been called upon to repress the excitement, appear by their conduct to have been the instruments of increasing and continuing it. How, sir, asked Mr. R. had the difficulty commenced? Was it not caused by a fugitive from Canada, a traitor according to the laws of his country, for whose head a price had been offered, coming over the lines into the United States, and in open day, in the streets of Buffalo, by his inflammatory speeches, inducing the citizens of the United States to take up arms, and assist in a rebellion of the subjects of a friendly power, who was rightfully endeavoring to maintain her institutions? This fugitive had not only been harbored and entertained by us, but recruits from amongst our citizens were openly mustered to his standard. Now have we forgotten the laws of nations as we applied them when Gen. Jackson seized upon Pensacola, because her authorities harbored our Indian enemy, and furnished them with munitions of war? He then ably demonstrated, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, then Secretary of State, that for such a cause we had a right to take possession by the sword of the city of a friendly nation; and have the citizens of Buffalo done less than the Governor of Pensacola? He commented at some length on the law of nations, so far as related to the pursuit of enemies over neutral ground, and the practice of our own Government in such cases. He said it would be well for gentlemen to reverse the matter, and to suppose ourselves in the situation of the Canadas. Suppose the subjects of Great Britain should gather together upon our frontiers, in combination with some discontented, factious citizens, with the avowed purpose of overturning our republican institutions—how would we bear it? and how would we tolerate the idea that munitions of war, provisions, and fire-arms, should be furnished these our enemies by British subjects? Unquestionably we would consider ourselves as grossly wronged, and would be very slow in recognising any spirit of friendship as dictating such measures. We would not look to individuals; we would properly look to the Government, whose duty it was to control its citizens. Inefficiency was no plea, for then we ought to cease our existence amongst the family of nations. As to the steamboat affair, before he made up his opinion as to any outrage committed by the British soldiery, he must know all the facts. Should it turn out that this steamboat was actually in the possession of the hostile islanders, used for carrying articles contraband of war, he was not sure that the act was not perfectly justifiable according to the laws of nations. At all events, it was a gallant enterprise, and such as, he doubted not, every bold man on this floor would have deemed himself morally justifiable in undertaking. But we were ignorant of all the facts. So far, however, as they were known, the citizens of the United States were the aggressors throughout. As they would get all the glory, they should also take all the responsibility, in defiance of the laws of their country, of assailing a friendly nation.

Mr. R. was not going into a war upon such indefensible causes. One war, with a debt of 180 millions, was enough for one generation. War was dangerous to the liberty of any people, but especially so under our free institutions, whose very existence was based upon a jealousy of power accumulated in the hands of Government. In this affair we had, so far, nothing to be proud of. We had been the first aggressors, and should act the part of an honorable aggressor, knowing that we were wrong. Mr. R. concluded by urging on the House to pursue an honest policy, and to exhibit an upright, honorable bearing on the subject, worthy of a free and enlightened nation.

Mr. MENIFEE fully concurred in the opinion that it was the duty of Congress to look at the matter calmly, and to pursue a liberal and statesmanlike course in relation to it; but he considered it extremely unwise for gentlemen thus prematurely to express themselves in a manner calculated to produce a hostile state of feeling between the people of this country and Great Britain. It was to be presumed, as a matter of course, that this nation would vindicate its rights; but let not gentlemen anticipate what we would do, before the state of the case arises. If any great principle were involved, such as "the right of search," or the "impressment of American seamen," it would, he admitted, be a different affair; but as no such great principles were involved in the present case, in the absence of that, he was extremely unwilling that we should be forced into a state of things when we should be influenced by passion, contrary to the dictate of principle. He considered the expression of hostile feelings toward Great Britain as absolutely preposterous. Gentlemen seemed to forget that between us and that country war was growing unfashionable, and that we were actuated and governed by a nobler principle: that of the advancement of human liberty.

Mr. M. endeavored to show that greater causes had been at work, previous to the attack on the steamboat Caroline, to produce the present state of things. He alluded at some length to the policy of this Government toward Mexico, which, he contended, had engendered a lawless and dishonorable feeling in our citizens, and had influenced their conduct in relation to Canada. He was in favor of a reference of the whole subject to committees.

Mr. THOMPSON said he hoped that he had given evidence, since he had been a member of this body, that he was not disposed unnecessarily to involve the country in war. He had, when he was first up, deprecated a war with England. If he had not expressed himself on this point as strongly as other gentlemen, it was only because he could not. He had said, and he repeated, that nothing could be more disastrous to both countries, if not fatal to the cause of human liberty. He could nevertheless conceive of a case in which we could not hesitate—a case involving the honor, the very existence of our Government. Such, he did not hesitate to say, would be the case if the facts stated in the affidavits we now heard read are true. He knew nothing of the facts—he would not pre-judge the case—he would not rely upon newspaper and ex parte statements on either side; he wanted information in an authentic form. But if that statement is true, (and the President seems to think it so,) it is a cold blooded, unmitigated, and savage murder of unoffending American citizens with circumstances of atrocity unprecedented among civilized nations, even in a state of actual war. He sincerely hoped that there were facts which would excuse or explain the statement which we now have. If there are not, no disclaimer on the part of the British Government, no atonement by that Government short of a surrender to our tribunals of the ferocious assassins, should, or would satisfy the American people. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Menifee) had said that there was no danger of war; that there was no principle involved; none such as the right of search. No principle involved! Gread God! sir, are we to be told that there is no principle involved in the invasion of our territory by a hostile band of another nation, and the murder, with fiendish atrocity, of our sleeping and unoffending citizens? The gentleman has alluded to another topic, which, although Mr. T. had anticipated, he did not expect from that quarter. The gentleman said, that the course of our Government towards Mexico had been infamous, cowardly, but that we were now about to be forced by England, our peer, our equal, to do that which our sense of justice had not prompted towards Mexico. Mr. T. confessed that he had no wish to see our Government presented in this light to the civilized world. It would be one of the strangest changes in these times, when nothing is certain but change, that he (Mr. T.) should become the apologist of this, or of the last Administration. But he was not disposed to assail improperly even this Administration, and to embarrass or weaken it in its foreign intercourse and disputes. The first duty he held to be to sustain our Government in its controversies with foreign powers to the utmost extent of justice and right. The second, to break down this dangerous and pernicious Administration, which no man more than he desires to see trampled down as it deserves to be. Mr. T. had watched the course of the Administration through the whole progress of the war in Texas, and he was prepared to prove that our Government had exerted every power under the Constitution and laws to enforce neutrality.

The laws upon that subject are, in the main, penal, not preventive. There was no power to prevent our citizens from expatriating themselves to Texas or any other country, nor to prevent them from bearing arms in the wars of their new country. Such was almost, in every instance, the case with our citizens who went to Texas. Not one in one hundred has gone there with other view than of permanent settlement. The only law which could have prevented this was the act of 1818, forbidding enlistment for foreign service. In all cases, along our whole border, the district attorneys were earnestly and repeatedly urged to enforce the law. If they did not, it was no fault of the Government. It resulted from a universal sympathy of our people with the gallant struggle of the Texans, which rendered the enforcing the law impossible. Quid voleant leges sine maribus. You never can enforce a law which violates the general feeling of the country, without breaking down the most sacred guaranty of public liberty—the trial by jury. So much, sir, for the infamous violation of our neutrality, for which the gentleman from Kentucky desires to see us forced to a different course by the power of England. I agree with my friend and colleague, (Mr. Rhett) in his reprehension of the conduct of some of our citizens on the Canada frontier. Their conduct is not only wrong; it is criminal. Every citizen is bound, in law and in honor, to respect the treaty stipulations of his Government. There is scarcely a political crime more dangerous in its consequences than a violation of this duty. But I do not see justification or excuse in the fact of some of our citizens having, as individuals, gone to Canada, and engaged in the insurrection, for an armed band, said to be a portion of the Canadian army, invading our soil, and murdering our citizens who were innocent (and such is the statement) of any participation in the war now raging in Canada. The cases are wide as the poles apart. Mr. T. doubted not that the national honor would be taken care of by those who administer our Government. No Administration dare do otherwise. The note of the Secretary of State to Mr. Fox may, and no doubt does, go as far as is proper at this moment. If it had expressed the purpose on the part of our Government, in the event of the statement which we have heard read turning out to be true, to demand the actors in this horrible butchery to be tried by our tribunals, Mr. T. would have regarded it as not going an inch too far.

Mr. WISE addressed the House at some length, and concluded by moving the previous question on the motion of reference; which, being ordered, the question was then taken on the main question, and the same was agreed to, without a division.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, as follows:

To the President of the United States:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Jan. 8, 1838.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred certain resolutions of the House of Representatives, bearing date the 5th instant, the last of which requests the President "to communicate to that House any additional information in his possession, of acts endangering the amicable relations between this Government and that of Great Britain, either by the subjects of Great Britain, or by our own citizens, on the Canadian frontier, and what measures have been adopted by the Executive to preserve our neutrality with said kingdom, or repel invasion from a foreign country," has the honor to report to the President, that, excepting two papers, which it is understood will accompany an Executive communication to Congress to-day, all the information in the possession of this Department, as requested by the above recited resolutions, is contained in the copies of documents transmitted to the President with the report of this date, in answer to the second resolution of the Senate, to which the Secretary begs leave respectfully to refer.

(Signed) JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28, 1837.

SIR: I am informed by Major General Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, that Her Majesty's 43d regiment of light infantry is under orders to proceed from that Province to the Province of Lower Canada; and that, marching by the route of the Grand Falls, and the Madawaska Settlement, the regiment will cross a part of the territory in dispute between the two countries.

Sir John Harvey has requested me to explain to the Government of the United States, and he is desirous that the same explanation should be given, through the proper channel, to the Government of the State of Maine, that this movement of troops, which will probably take place in the first week of January, is in no way whatever connected with any recent occurrences in the disputed territory; but that it is undertaken, in pursuance of superior orders, for the sole purpose of reinforcing the British military station in Lower Canada.

The route by the Grand Falls and the Madawaska Settlement has all along been made use of for the transmission of the post, and for other ordinary communications between the two Provinces.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient and humble servant,

H. S. FOX.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 2, 1837.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 28th ultimo, apprizing me that you had been informed by Major General Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, that Her Majesty's 43d regiment had been ordered to proceed to Lower Canada, and would cross a part of the territory in dispute between the two countries, about the first week in January, and that you had been requested by Sir John Harvey to explain to this Government, and through the proper channel to the Government of the State of Maine, that this movement is in no way whatever connected with any recent occurrences in the disputed territory; but that it is undertaken in pursuance of superior orders, for the sole purpose of reinforcing the British military station in Lower Canada.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my high consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Forsyth to Governor Dunlap.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Dec. 5, 1837.

SIR: I transmit herewith, for the information of your excellency, the copy of a note addressed to the Department on the 28th ult. by the British Minister at Washington, with the view of explaining to the Government of the United States, and through it to that of the State of Maine, an intended movement of Her Majesty's 43d regiment of light infantry from the Province of New Brunswick to the Province of Lower Canada, which will, probably, take place in January next, through that part of the disputed territory on our Northeastern frontier over which the British mail passes. This explanation, as you will perceive, is made to the Federal Government by the request of Major General Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, in order to guard against any apprehension, in any quarter, of the movement referred to, of British troops; and it is now communicated to you, in accordance with his wish. Although the necessity of explaining a circumstance so little likely to be misapprehended by the Government or people of the United States, or of individual States, is not apparent, the motive of that explanation should be duly appreciated.

A printed copy of the President's annual Message to Congress, delivered to-day at 12 m. is enclosed.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose to you an official despatch, dated the 23d ultimo, which I have received from Sir Francis Head, Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada.

It appears from the statement contained in this despatch, and I lament to say that the same facts are fully and notoriously confirmed by information which has reached me through various other channels, that a part of the British territory of Upper Canada is at this moment actually invaded, the peace and safety of the inhabitants disturbed, and the existence of the Provincial Government threatened by a formidable body of armed men, proceeding from the United States, furnished with artillery and ammunition, and fully equipped for war. These piratical invaders, who are now established at a point called "Navy Island," on the Canadian side of the river Niagara, consist, in part, of outlaws who had fled from Upper Canada after the suppression of the late partial insurrection; in part also of American citizens, and of men of other nations who have been recruited for the present felonious attempt within the confines of the United States. They are commanded by a native American of the name of Van Rensselaer. They continue openly and publicly to procure, from a number of American towns near to the Canadian frontier, provisions, arms, ammunition, and all other things necessary to sustain their criminal enterprise. Their strength and numbers, and means of violence, are daily increasing, by recruits and contributions raised within the United States, in defiance of the known laws of the Republic, in defiance, also, of the recorded wishes and feelings of all respectable classes of the American people, and to the scandal of public order and good neighborhood between peaceful nations.

I well know that the President and Government of the United States do equally with myself deplore and condemn these strange and unlawful proceedings, which threaten no less a calamity than the waging of an unprovoked war, by a portion of the American people, against a neighboring portion of Her Majesty's subjects, at a time when the two people in general, and their Governments, are not only united in peace, but are studying to enlarge the sphere of a happy and beneficial intercourse, and to strengthen the bonds of national affection and friendship. I feel, therefore, that I am doing no unfriendly act in pointing out to the Government of the United States the facts which have been brought officially to my knowledge, showing how the laws of the Republic are transgressed, and the wishes of its best citizens defied, to the detriment of a friendly and kindred people; and I solemnly appeal to the supreme Government of the Republic promptly to interpose its sovereign authority for arresting these disorders, before they shall have produced a train of disasters and of national resentments, which it is equally the devout wish of both Governments to avert.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high respect and consideration, your most obedient and humble servant.

H. S. FOX.

Lieutenant Governor Head to Mr. Fox.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Toronto, Upper Canada, Dec. 23, 1837.

SIR: It is my duty to lose no time in apprizing your excellency that the peace and security of this Province are at this moment threatened, and that its territory is actually invaded, by a large band of American citizens from Buffalo, who have taken up arms, and established themselves in a hostile manner on Navy Island, in the Niagara river, and within the territory of Upper Canada.

Your excellency has, no doubt, learned from the public papers that, in consequence of the insurrection unhappily commenced in Lower Canada, but which, I have reason to believe, is now effectually suppressed, an attempt as rash and hopeless as it was wicked was lately made by three or four hundred persons in this vicinity to involve this Province in the miseries of civil war. In concert with this movement an endeavor was also made to excite the people in another district to take up arms against the Government. Both these attempts were promptly and effectually suppressed by the loyal militia of this Province, unaided by any military force. Most of the deluded persons who were engaged in this rash and criminal enterprise have surrendered themselves or been taken; but the principal leader, William Lyon McKenzie, and some of the most active of his followers, succeeded, with great difficulty, in making their escape to the adjoining State of New York.

It was soon reported to me that at Buffalo, to which place these traitors fled, strong symptoms were shown by numbers of American citizens to aid them with men and arms, and to supply them with other necessaries, in order to enable them to make a hostile invasion of this Province.

That the public authorities in Buffalo and the more respectable portion of the inhabitants would discountenance such proceedings, I had no doubt, and their conduct since has justified that expectation; but as it was doubtful how far they might be able promptly to control this ebullition of hostile feeling towards a nation with which the United States hold the strictest relations of amity and peace, I immediately addressed a letter to his Excellency Governor Marcy, at Albany, a copy of which is herewith sent.

No reply to this has yet reached me, nor do I know what steps, if any, have been taken on the part of the American Government at Buffalo to repress this hostile rising of their people.

Since that letter was written, McKenzie has been joined by some hundreds of American citizens from Buffalo and the adjacent villages, and they have established themselves on Navy Island, as I have before mentioned, with artillery and arms procured in the United States

The paper printed at Buffalo, which I send you, will show the spirit in which this movement is urged forward.

I am, of course, taking all possible means to repel invasion and insult, and I believe that in a few days a considerable military force will be at hand to sustain our gallant militia in this extraordinary and unlooked-for conflict.

I need not remark to your excellency how unfair and unjust it is that a rebellion, which, within this province, was so insignificant that it was instantly crushed by the civil inhabitants of the country, should be renewed and rendered formidable by the direct and active encouragement of the American people; and that during the existence, not merely of peace, but of the most friendly relations between Great Britain and the Government of the United States, the peaceful population of this province should be threatened with devastation and plunder, and all the miseries of civil war, by the unjustifiable interference of American citizens.

Though inhabiting a remote portion of the British dominions, the people of Upper Canada feel that they may rest assured of being ultimately protected by the whole force of the empire, if it be necessary.

They are conscious, also, that they deserve kinder offices at the hands of the American people, and I appeal to you, in their name, and as the representative of their sovereign, to urge upon the Government of the United States the immediate exertion of military force to suppress a movement of their people so insulting and injurious to a neighboring nation, and which, whatever temporary calamity it may inflict, must inevitably, unless promptly checked, lead to a national war, in which any wrongs committed against the people of this colony will, under the protection of a just Providence, be amply redressed.

I beg your excellency will not fail to assure the American Government of my sincere conviction that the facts of which I complain will certainly meet with their most unqualified reprobation.

I have the honor to be, sir, your excellency's most obedient, humble servant.

F. B. HEAD,
Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, January 5, 1838.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your communication of the 4th instant, with the official despatch of the 23d ult. from the Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada. The President, to whom they were immediately submitted, has directed me to reply, that he perceives with great satisfaction that you are duly sensible, not only of the wishes and feelings of this Government in relation to the unfortunate state of things on the frontiers of the United States, but of the general disposition of the people and authorities of this country to cultivate and extend that beneficial intercourse with Great Britain, so well adapted to strengthen the existing bonds of national affection and friendship between the two nations.

You have already seen, in the public journals, the efforts that have been made, and are now making, both by the General and State Governments, to prevent any of our misguided citizens from interfering in the disturbances of the neighboring territory of the Canadas. I have had the honor, also, to make you acquainted with other measures which are in progress to the same effect, founded upon the information received from the officers of the United States, who were sent to the frontiers to prevent violations of our laws; and I now repeat to you formally, for the satisfaction of your Government, and to relieve the anxieties of the authorities of Upper Canada, that all the constitutional power vested in the Executive will be exerted to maintain the supremacy of those laws which were passed to fulfill the obligations of the United States to all friendly nations who may be unfortunately engaged in foreign or domestic war.

Assurances to that effect, to the authorities of Upper Canada, may be given in the strongest terms; and the President does not doubt that this object, so desirable in the present crisis to both Governments, will be accomplished, if insurmountable obstacles are not thrown in the way by the rashness of persons within the dominions of Her Britannic Majesty, who, in their resentment or apprehensions, may think themselves authorized to make aggressions upon the United States for injuries committed by individuals who are violators of our laws, and who escape prosecution and punishment under a temporary excitement produced by the events on the frontier, and by the menaces directed against our own people by some of Her Majesty's imprudent subjects.

With great respect and consideration, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Jan. 8, 1837.

The Secretary of State, to whom have been referred certain resolutions of the House of Representatives, dated the 5th instant, the second of which requests the President of the United States to communicate to that body "copies of all instructions to the officers of the Government of the United States, and all correspondence with them, with the Governors of any of the States, and with the Governments and officers of Mexico and of Great Britain, concerning the preservation of the neutrality of the United States in the civil wars and insurrections in Mexico, and in any of the British provinces north of the United States, since the year 1829; and particularly of a letter from the late President of the United States to the Secretary of the Territory of Arkansas, dated on or about the 10th of December, 1830," has the honor to report to the President the accompanying papers, embracing all the instructions and correspondence requested by the resolution above cited, not already published, with the exception of the letter from the late President of the United States to the Secretary of the Territory of Arkansas, said to be dated on or about the 10th of December, 1830. PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. ADAMS in the Chair, on the President's Message.

The question pending was on the resolution of Mr. HAYNES, which is as follows:

"Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the finances, and every thing connected therewith; to the safe keeping of the public moneys, and every thing connected therewith; and so much as relates to the Bank of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means."

And the amendment moved thereto by Mr. CUSHING, as follows:

"Whereas, the influence of the Executive Department of the Federal Government has, for some time past, in derogation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, continued to increase, and ought to be diminished:

Resolved, therefore, That, in order to correct the said abuse, so much of the President's Message as relates to the collection, safe keeping and transfer of the public money, be referred to ——, with instructions to report—

First, such method of keeping the public treasure, effects, and other property, as in the judgment of said committee shall conduce to promote the welfare, and to secure the liberties of the people; and,

Secondly, such other reforms in the practices of the Government as in their opinion shall tend to bring back the administration thereof to the standard of the original purity of the Constitution

Mr. MURRAY of Kentucky being entitled to the floor,

Mr. SMITH asked him to give way, to enable him to move to lay aside, for the present, the pending resolution, and proceed with the others, which would occupy but a short time, so that the subjects embraced in them might be put in charge of the appropriate standing committees.

Mr. HAYNES was as anxious as any one that the whole should be disposed of as soon as possible, but he questioned if the course suggested by the gentleman would expedite action upon the resolutions, for there was one other of them that would probably elicit considerable discussion.

The motion was objected to by other gentlemen, and Mr. MURRAY proceeded with his remarks, and addressed the House at great length; when,

On motion of Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, the committee rose.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to the resolution in relation to the Cherokee tribe of Indians.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, laid on the table.

MAINE BOUNDARY.

Mr. DAVEE, on leave, then offered the resolution given above, and the same having been read, on Mr. D's motion the House agreed to consider it at this time.

Mr. CUSHING then offered the following amendment, which was agreed to:

"And that the President of the United States be requested, if it be not in his judgment incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to this House any correspondence or communication held between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain at different times, respecting the wardenship, occupation, or actual possession of that part of the territory of the State of Maine which is claimed by Great Britain."

The resolution, as thus amended, was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing a series of portraits of the five past Presidents of the United States, painted by the late Gilbert Stuart, for the purpose of having the same suitably placed and preserved, either in the Capitol or in the Executive Mansion.

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the formation of new and accurate indexes to the whole series of journals, reports, and documents, since the organization of our Government, alphabetically pointing to each subject-matter, with the year, volume, and page of record; and that a letter from Thomas H. Gordon, herewith submitted, be referred to said committee.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of directing the Clerk of this House to subscribe for —— number of copies of such Journal or Register as may publish regularly, and be suitable for the Journal of proceedings and the ayes and noes of this House, and also the laws of Congress, for the purpose of distribution by the members of this House.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 9, 1838.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. A. VAN BUREN, his private secretary, on the subject of the recent invasion of our territory on the Canada frontier, and destruction of the lives of our citizens, by the British authorities of Upper Canada.

[It is the same document as that given in our House proceedings of yesterday.]

The message having been read,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky rose, and moved that that portion of the message which relates to an appropriation be referred to the Committee on Finance; and that the other portion of it, relating to our foreign affairs, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. While up, Mr. C. said he must take occasion to say that he did think that the recent outrage committed on the soil of the United States, and on the lives of its citizens, was of the most atrocious nature in its character and consequences—wholly unjustifiable, and not in the slightest degree palliated by any thing which preceded it. And, sir, (said Mr. C.) there was a character of deliberation attending it which aggravates the enormity. It was in the dead hour of the night; it was from a shore in a belligerant condition, and therefore in a state of constant watchfulness; it was after a state of preparation, which must have been at least three or four hours, showing that the commander of the British forces was apprised of it, and the destination of the attacking force. It was altogether impossible that he was ignorant of the fact that this vessel was lying quietly at anchor within our jurisdiction, and therefore in a condition which could not justify an attack. It was under all these circumstances that the attack was made. Neither the people of the United States, in the aggregate, nor those in the immediate neighborhood of the disturbed district, nor the Government of the United States, had done any thing to justify this most unparalleled outrage. I want no further evidence (said Mr. C.) than that now presented to me, to satisfy me that there is nothing to justify it. It was to be regretted (Mr. C. said) that in our own history examples had been furnished by which this outrage might be palliated. Without, however, adverting to them, or to any recent occurrences, he would only say that the true ground for a great nation to place itself on, was that of justice; that it should respect the rights of all nations, the weak as well as the powerful; and to abstain from all acts which might hereafter be brought up as precedents against them. While he made these remarks, he by no means wished to be understood as desiring to kindle up a spirit of war between this country and Great Britain; though he thought that ample, prompt and full indemnity should be given us. He should, as much as any man, deplore a war; but, looking to the vast resources of our country, the valor of our citizens, and our achievements in former times, he would not fear the result. If (said Mr. C.) it should be a war with Great Britain, he would deeply deplore it; but in this cause it would be a just war, and he would be ready to meet it. With the present friendly relations between this country and Great Britain, with the exception of the recent occurrences in the northeast, he did not see any cause to apprehend it.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his hopes that, in this early stage, and before we were fully advised, that no attempt would be made to excite the feelings of the public by debating the subject, which must be the natural result of such a course. He had hoped that all the papers relative to this important matter would be carefully examined before taking further steps.

The late difficulties on our frontier might, by any reasonable person, have been anticipated. There are so many ties which necessarily bind the feelings of the population on either and both sides of the boundary line on that part of our frontiers, which has been the scene of bloodshed and outrage, that any attempt by either Government to oppress such population, would call forth the sympathies of the other; and in case of any movement in Canada, what could we expect but that our citizens would take part with the inhabitants, even though their wrongs were but pretended, in case due care was not taken by Government to prevent such interference?

What more distressing event could come than a war between two such nations as Great Britain and the United States? The human mind cannot conceive of a greater calamity. And this may be averted by a careful examination of all the facts on both sides of the subject as now presented for our consideration. Many wrongs may have been committed by our citizens of which we are now unadvised, and many palliations may be produced in favor of the other side.

We must reverse the order of the question.

Suppose an attempt was made by the State of New York to rebel against, and overturn the Government of this country. The rebels were joined from the Canada side. A rendezvous established, perchance at Navy Island.

Boats were constantly employed in supplying, from the opposite shore, the enemy at such post with arms, ammunition, and provisions. Should we so hastily and deeply condemn the conduct of the commanding officer of our Government, were he to cut out, seize, burn, and destroy such a boat? Should we then be as ready to grant, as we now are to demand redress? or should we not rather, in reply to such demand, wish time to investigate, and deliberately examine, all the causes leading to the commission of the outrage?

It would, in his opinion, be time enough to discuss the question after the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations should have been heard. We should be then better advised as to a future course of conduct. Mr. C. implored the Senate, in the consideration of this subject, not to adopt any rash or hasty measures.

Mr. BENTON said that before this question went out of the Senate, he must be permitted to say a solitary word arising out of it. A statement had been made on the other side of the chamber, (by Mr. Clay,) which he was unwilling should go forth to the world uncontradicted. After characterizing this outrage in very appropriate language, and in a manner becoming an American, the member said, as it had caught his ears, that "this outrage had a precedent in our conduct towards other nations." Now, lest the British should derive an excuse for it, from hearing it said in this chamber, that an example for this outrage had been given by our Government, he (Mr. B.) would take this occasion to say, emphatically, that he knew of no such example to be found in our history.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in conformity with a resolution of the 5th instant, specifying the amount and character of the Treasury notes issued under the law of the last session, having been read,

Mr. WEBSTER remarked, he should move the printing of the report, and should hereafter move its reference to the Committee on Finance. At the last session the issue of these Treasury notes had been authorized by law, and when the bill was on its passage, it was then proposed that the same should bear no interest, and a movement was made to strike out the clause specifying the interest. This plan, however, did not succeed, and the issue was authorized with interest.

The rate of interest to be fixed upon the notes was left to the discretion of the President, with the proviso that such rate should not exceed six per cent.

The friends of the measure urged its adoption on the ground that it was a good mode of securing a loan to Government. It seemed, from the report, that some of the notes had been issued on interest, at the rate of six per cent. and others at the mere nominal rate of one mill. It was on this point he should hereafter express his opinion, and inquire whether, in this respect, the Secretary had performed his duty, according to the spirit of the law. Nor was this all. He should inquire into the manner in which these notes had been disposed of, and here would repeat the question he so often put at the last session. Does any man voluntarily receive a less per centage than the limits of the law allows him? Or would any man receive for a debt due five per cent. less than par, when he was entitled to par?

These persons might involuntarily receive this depreciated paper, rather than surrender a valuable contract, without which such contracts could not be fulfilled, yet they would expect the difference to be made up from some quarter, and how was this difference to be obtained.

Why all heavy contractors will, of course, come to Congress with their petitions, and demand, and of right expect, remuneration for this loss or difference. He had already been frequently applied to to petition for an appropriation for this purpose. He should take an early day to inquire of the Committee on Finance, the expediency of amending the law so as to meet these exigencies.

A report relative to the business of the General Land Office for the present year; laid on the table, and ordered to be printed, with, on motion, an addition of 1000 copies.

Mr. CHEATHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Mary Shepard, and other heirs at law of Captain Frederick M. Bell, deceased.

Mr. LEADBETTER, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Zebulon Sheetz.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affaires, moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the report of the Secretary of War, accompanying the President's annual message; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BELL wished to know the grounds for making this motion.

Mr. McKAY replied that, by the rules of the House, one of the duties of the Committee on Military Affairs was to take charge of all matters in relation to the military defence of the country. Now, they were in the second month of the session, and nothing of a public nature had as yet been referred to that committee. The annual report of the Secretary of War, which contained all the recommendations that, in his opinion, should be adopted by Congress—that report was contained in the President's Message, and, with that document, was then before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Now, the House very well knew the present condition of the country, and if it was intended that any action should be had on subjects so important, it was time the reference should be made; for, he repeated, the committee had nothing before it but private claims; not a single object of inquiry of a public nature, with the exception of one for extending the pension system. Among the recommendations were those for the defence of the western frontier, and the increase of the army, and though he would not say it was probable the committee would concur in them, still, as they had been urged from time to time by the Executive, it was due to him that they should be taken into consideration. Because the matter was referred, or because the committee asked the reference, it did not follow that they would report in favor of all, or even any one of the recommendations.

Mr. BELL said if it should be thought by the House that there was any thing peculiar, or any thing pressing, in the nature of the public service, requiring the reference asked for, he should have no objection to it; but it appeared to him that there was no greater urgency in this case than might be alleged by other standing committees having charge of subjects alluded to in the Message.

The main reason, however, of Mr. B's objecting to this proposition was, because he was aware that, to some extent, there was a disposition to press the question of a great increase of the regular army immediately, and it was to resist, so far as lay in his power, this mode of action upon that subject, that he rose to ask for an explanation of the honorable chairman of the Military Committee. The House would remember that the late increase of the army—and they must not forget that they had had an increase—was voted upon a very slight examination, scarcely a gaze, by the House, and that was an increase, too, of from five to upwards of seven thousand men, perhaps, altogether. The House would also remember the circumstances of the panic, or the allegations that were made upon that occasion, which were thought sufficient to justify that departure from the former policy of the Government. Not only that, but they authorized the Executive to call out ten thousand men upon an emergency, and they all knew how this power had been used by the Executive. Now, Mr. R. protested against any mode of acting upon this subject which should be precipitate. He did not mean, however, to express an opinion against some increase of the army, but the increase proposed was an extraordinary one, and was pressed with extraordinary circumstances, being a proposition to increase the standing army to some fifteen thousand men. It was true the gentleman said the Committee might not adopt those recommendations, but the House all knew that there was a general disposition to do so, and out of doors it began to be talked about as if the bill had already passed.

But the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. McKay,) adverted to other questions, and appealed to the House to know if it desired the committee to take charge of measures for the western frontier. Did the gentleman allude to the Canada frontier? If he did, could he expect any action on the part of that committee, even the House itself, or sufficient to repress the disorders or arrest the difficulties on that border? Did he allude to the condition of the western frontier as of one likely to be immediately critical? If so, the House had no proof of the fact before them. Even were it so, what ought to be done? What was the condition of the regular army? Almost wholly withdrawn from our whole frontier, and concentrated in Florida, and the only remedy would be undoubtedly to recall one-third of them.

On this point Mr. B. begged to state that, for one, before he should be prepared to act on the proposition, which he expected to be brought forward, to augment our army by some seven or eight thousand men, he should urge the propriety of calling upon the most experienced officers in the country—men who had spent the better portion of their lives on the Western frontier—to know if there was an indispensable necessity for it, and to ascertain whether it was or was not their opinion that a reform in the head of the army at this city was not more greatly needed. He should urge upon the House the necessity of an examination, for their own satisfaction, before a committee of this House, of the experienced working men of the army—men who had seldom visited this city, but had spent fifteen or twenty years west of the mountains. He wanted to hear from them where the defect was: whether in the troops, their number, the number of regiments, quality of the material of the army, etc; or whether the defect did not exist elsewhere. In conclusion, unless the gentleman should state the necessity of immediate action upon some of these subjects, Mr. B. should suppose the regular course would be that this portion of the Message should take its turn with the rest; for he saw, at present, no reason for giving it a preference.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that it seemed to him the gentleman himself had furnished to the House a very powerful argument in support of the proposition before it. The gentleman appears to admit the necessity of doing something for the defence of the frontier, though he appears to differ from the War Department, and is against an increase of the army. He then tells them that he himself requires an examination, and admits it to be very proper that an examination should take place in the Committee of Military Affairs. Where, then, can be the objection to the motion now pending? They had been already in session six weeks; and Mr. C. appealed to every gentleman if the course pursued did not present a novel and extraordinary spectacle, entirely unprecedented except at the "panic" session, of so long a time discussing the reference of the President's Message? He asked them candidly if they were not pursuing a course, the continuance of which must defeat every measure, great or small, necessary or unnecessary, that should come before them? He appealed to the House to say whether the measures they were called upon to examine were to be postponed, at the rate of a speech a day, to the end of the session? Mr. C. hoped the motion would prevail; and even if the discussion alluded to should go on, at least let one of the standing committees have some public measures before it.

Mr. BELL had not admitted the necessity of action in relation to the western frontier, but suggested what he believed to be the true remedy, namely, to recall a portion of the troops in Florida, say one thousand out of the ten thousand now there for the purpose of hunting up five hundred or a thousand Indians.

Well, in reference to the delay: who was responsible for this extraordinary delay? Mr. B. had seen it alleged in the newspaper organ of the Government that it arose from a concerted design on the part of certain political gentlemen on that floor and out of the House. So far as he was concerned, there was not the slightest foundation for it; nor did he believe there was any concert whatever. None had come to his knowledge.

Then as to the delay, let him ask, who had the power in that House? Why, the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Cambreleng,) had only to rise in his place, and, if the exigency became urgent, call around him his forces, and arrest the further discussion. Where was the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Hamer?) He had not summoned up to his aid the troops generally at his command, which he could do at any moment. Mr. B. denied any intention of thwarting the public business, and even putting all the hours together spent in the debate referred to, it would not make over two or three working days of the House. But even if it should be important that the whole message should be referred, they had only to stay in their places, and if the discussion became too long, sit them out, and force those gentlemen to speak who would speak. That had been the course heretofore.

Mr. McKAY said the gentleman from Tennessee had misapprehended the object of the committee in reporting that resolution to the House. The gentleman had discussed it as if there were a distinct proposition then before the House to increase the standing army of the United States to fifteen thousand men. Now, there was no proposition of that kind before them. The object of the committee, on the contrary, was to avoid the very thing the gentleman himself so much depreeated, viz: acting on measures without examination. The Executive was charged by the Constitution with the defence of the country, and, in pursuance of this duty, the officer at the head of the War Department thinks there should be an increase of the army. This was also recommended by the Executive repeatedly. But it did not follow that the committee would concur in the recommendation, and report a bill to the number asked for by the Secretary of War; and why should the gentleman make such remarks for the purpose of alarming the House and the country, that there is to be a large standing army quartered upon it? Why there was no such proposition before it. All the Committee on Military Affairs sought by the introduction of the resolution, was the very time the gentleman himself thought to be so important, and which, from what had occurred up to this time, there seemed but little probability of being afforded to them They were then in the second month of the session, and had not yet referred the third branch of subjects embraced in the President's message, and, from present appearances, the discussion on that point alone might continue two or three months longer; for it was a general political discussion, ranging over and embracing in review the whole policy of the Government for years past, and every act of the late and present Administrations.

The gentleman remarked that this discussion might be brought to a close. True. But still it might be protracted for two or three months more, and what would be the consequence? Why this very evil, of having a proposition brought in and forced through the House, as in that case it necessarily must be, without sufficient time being allowed for deliberation. That would be the inevitable effect of voting down this motion; or let him ask, was it intended to withhold this report of the Secretary of War from the Military Committee altogether?

Mr. BELL said "No."

Mr. M'KAY. The gentleman says "no," then whence his objection? Where the necessity of delay? Why not refer it at once? Ah, but says the gentleman, two or three years ago, under the influence of a panic, the standing army was increased by an addition of two thousand men, and he was unwilling to be so operated upon again. The gentleman was mistaken as to the number, for the two additional regiments ordered upon that occasion did not comprise more than about twelve hundred men rank and file. But still it did not follow, as he before remarked, that the committee would adopt the recommendations of the Executive; and in reference to the occasion of the former increase, Mr. M'K. was not sure that the gentleman did not vote for it, while he himself voted against it.

Mr. M'K. concluded by saying, that he was the last man who wished to repress debate, nor was the present proposition intended, nor would it have the effect, to restrict the discussion going on upon the resolution, to refer the subject of the finances to the Committee of Ways and Means. Let the gentlemen, and those who wish it, proceed with it, in the widest range, all he asked then was, at least to permit one of the committees to be in possession of something upon which they might act. As to an unnecessary increase of the standing army, no man was more opposed to it than Mr. M'K. was, as his votes would prove.

Mr. CUSHING wished to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from New York (Mr. Cambreleng.) That gentleman had referred to the very extraordinary delay in referring the President's Message to the appropriate committees, and adduced the panic ression as offering the only parallel. Now, how many times had the Committee of the Whole discussed this matter? He believed it had sat four times only in the course of six weeks; the last two had been productive each of a single speech, and those two speeches were by friends of the Administration. Was that a delay meriting of condemnation? Two of them, surely, the gentleman would exclude from censure; and during the other two, Mr. C. would insist that there had been nothing more than proper, reasonable, judicious debate, and that debate equally participated in by both sides of the House. If, then, there had been an unusual delay, it certainly was not of an intemperate and excessive character, nor upon mere grounds of opposition, but grew out of other causes and considerations. In reference to the question before the House, Mr. C. was not only in favor of it, but of going still farther. He had no objection to discharge the Committee of the Whole from all the resolutions of reference of the President's Message, except that on the subject of the finances, and should vote for such a proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, adverting to the allegation of the Globe cited by Mr. BELL, said that so far as the charge of concert or combination to produce delay applied to him, it was utterly false. In reference to the resolution under consideration, he wished to state, at that time, a few facts.

Mr. McKAY wished to make a single explanatory remark. Even if the House should adopt this resolution, it would not preclude discussion on the subject of the army in Committee of the Whole on the President's Message, since it had no reference to so much of it as was embraced in that document. The resolution applied only to the annual report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. UNDERWOOD so understood the question, and it was one reason why he was inclined to vote for the resolution. However, he had another reason too, and that was, that he wanted to see how the Military Committee would act on all those subjects.

Mr. U. by consent, then read a letter he had received from a gentleman in Tennessee, which went on to state that there were, at this time, more fighting men in Florida than Indians all told, including women and papooses.

Mr. BYNUM could not suppress his astonishment at the course pursued by the gentleman who had just read that letter. For his part he was at loss to divine the motive which had influenced that gentleman. Did he suppose that the introduction of a letter from an unknown individual could have any weight with the House, or be considered as any kind of proof to the allegations. Did he imagine that it would have the least influence on the Chairman of Military Affairs, or did he produce it with a view to affect the character of the Executive in relation to the army in Florida.

Mr. UNDERWOOD explained, that he knew the writer of the letter, who was a respectable individual. That letter stated that the number of troops in Florida exceeded the whole population of the Seminole nation, including squaws and children. It also states that $10 was given for wagons, etc. when the same could be obtained for one-half the sum. His object, therefore, in reading the letter was, that the committee and the House might investigate those charges, and ascertain whether they were correct.

Mr. BYNUM was still of opinion that the gentleman had pursued a very singular course, for if he wished to satisfy his mind as to the correctness of the allegations, why did he not introduce a resolution to that effect? Mr. B. had the greatest objection to the introduction of such letters in the House. If such a practice were admitted, then any vindictive individual, who had been discharged from office for misconduct, might thus gratify his malice by writing slanderous letters against the Executive. For his part he would protest against such a course of calumniating the Administration, and of wasting the time of the House.

With relation to the resolution offered by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, he thought it so reasonable and plain, that no objection could possibly be made; but as gentlemen had thought proper to raise objections, he would observe that the reference to that committee would not preclude, in the least, any discussion on the subject of increasing the standing army, when it came up in order before the House. If any individual would cast his eyes along our frontier, he must see that at all times there was a necessity for a standing army; and it would also be obvious that under the present peculiar circumstances in relation to our southwest, as well as our northern frontier, it was necessary to increase that force, and that immediate action was required on the subject.

He could not refrain from adverting to the inconsistent course of those who were opposed to the Administration. It was but the other day, during a debate on the subject of Canada and our Northern frontier, that one gentleman had laid all the blame on the Executive, whom he accused of inactivity and gross neglect in not providing troops beforehand for that emergency. But now that measures of that very nature were proposed by the Executive, the same party turned round, and said, "Oh! there is plenty of time; there is no reason for such precipitancy," and such like expressions. Now, (said Mr. B.) what is the Administration to do? One day its friends are blamed for their inactivity, and on the next, when they propose the very measures which they had been charged with neglecting, an alarm was raised of "haste, hurry, and of precipitating subjects without debate."

He took that opportunity to state that he was as much opposed to the unnecessary increase of the standing army of the country as any one else, inasmuch as he believed its existence dangerous to the institutions of a free people. But that there was a necessity for increasing our army to a certain extent at the present time, no man could possibly deny. He was not prepared to say that he would vote to increase it to the number of 15,000, but it was his firm belief that the necessity for an increase of the army to some extent, was becoming more apparent every day of our lives. He was an advocate at all times for full and free discussion upon every subject proposed by the Administration, and if those measures would not stand the test of discussion, he sincerely hoped they would fall. But the fact of the case was, that the gentlemen on the other side had themselves shrunk from discussion, when they had on all occasions full scope to express themselves on all subjects. He hoped the subject would be taken from the Committee of the Whole, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRIGGS saw no objection to the reference, as there would be hereafter a full opportunity for an ample discussion on the merits of the subject. He believed there were many important particulars which could be entertained in the Committee on Military Affairs, that would not engage the attention of the Committee of the Whole in a general discussion.

Mr. TOUCEY asked for the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered.

Mr. BELL assured gentlemen that they were mistaken, if they supposed he had opposed the reference, because he might have an opportunity of addressing the committee. Such was not his motive, as he did not know that he should open his lips on the subject. He opposed it on the ground that it would be establishing a bad precedent. He protested against any hurried legislation on the subject, but still, at the same time, he was not an advocate for unnecessary delay.

Mr. GRENNELL was in favor of the reference, as such a course would take nothing from the grasp of the Committee of the Whole. He wished it to be understood that in voting for the resolution, he did not consider himself pledged either to an Executive or any other measure; but in this case there were investigations to be made, and facts to be ascertained, which object could not be so well attained by any other mode. Mr. G. adverted to the state of affairs on the southern frontier, as requiring the services of the army; and said that since it had been made the policy of Government to remove the Indians, while he had a seat in that House, he should think it his duty to protect those tribes, and also to protect our own citizens. He wished to say, once for all, that he was not an enemy to debate, and as the question of reference embraced no proposition for final action on the subject, he saw no good reason for refusing it.

Mr. BELL, after some further observations, proposed to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word resolved, and inserting:

"That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of all the subjects referred to in the annual message of the President, except so much thereof as is proposed to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means."

Mr. SMITH moved to amend the amendment of Mr. BELL by adding the following:

"That the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the annual message of the President of the United States, excepting only so much as relates to the finances, and every thing connected therewith; to the safe keeping of the public moneys and every thing connected therewith; and so much thereof as relates to the Bank of the United States."

Mr. TAYLOR was an advocate for debate on that or any other subject. He was perfectly willing that every measure of the Administration should be investigated to the utmost, and if it was consistent with their duty, and did not impede the action of committees, they might indulge in debate for three months, or for a longer period if they thought proper.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland moved to add an amendment, referring the subject of a cannon foundry to a select committee, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. J. said he wished to be understood that in offering the amendment, he meant no disrespect to the regular standing committees; but gentlemen would be aware that the subject had already been twice before Congress, without any action having been had thereon, as it had been dismissed for want of time. He thought the object would be more speedily attained by a reference to a special committee. Mr. J. was then proceeding to comment on the circumstances attending the Florida war, when

The SPEAKER reminded him that it would not be in order to discuss the merits of that subject upon a mere question of reference to a committee.

Mr. HAYNES then moved as an amendment, the resolutions proposed by him in Committee of the whole on the state of the Union, commencing with

Resolved, That so much of said Message as relates to the public lands, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

That so much of said Message as relates to Indian affairs, except what relates to the defence of the frontiers against Indian hostilities, and the protection of the Indians against the intrusions of citizens of the United States, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

That so much of said Message as relates to the defence of the frontiers against Indian hostilities, and the protection of the Indian tribes against the intrusions of citizens of the United States; so much thereof as relates to the establishment of a "manufactory of gunpowder," and a "manufactory of small arms west of the Alleghany mountains," together with so much as relates to the report of the Secretary of War, and the public interests entrusted to the War Department, except the subjects embraced in the immediately preceding resolutions, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

That so much of said Message as relates to the militia of the United States, be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

That so much of said Message as relates to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and the interests entrusted to the Navy Department, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

That so much of said Message as relates to the report of the Postmaster General, and the condition and operations of the Post Office Department, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

That so much of said Message as relates to a "uniform system of local government," and to "special and comprehensive legislation" for the District of Columbia, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

That so much of said Message as relates to the "casualties in steamboats, and the necessity of attempting to prevent them," be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment, as above modified, was accepted by Mr. BELL as his motion.

Mr. BELL thought, upon further reflection, it would be best to modify his motion so as to divide the questions of discharging the committee, and referring the parts of the Message now proposed to be referred, to the respective committees.

Mr. HAYNES said it would economise the time of the House by including both questions in a single motion, and the House could act more distinctly by taking up the resolutions offered by him, singly, and acting on them in their regular succession. By so doing, an opportunity would be afforded to the honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Johnson) to renew his amendment when the House should reach the resolution of reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. While up, he would say that it had been his intention, in the course of a very few days, if no further progress should be made, to move to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the Message, and to bring the subject into the House for its immediate decision. So far as the proposition to discharge the committee now goes, it was but an anticipation of the motion covering the whole subject, which he had intended to offer at an early day.

Mr. BELL accepted the amendment of Mr. Haynes as a modification of his own.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland subsequently moved to amend the resolution on the subject of a cannon foundry as follows:

"And that so much of the Executive communication as relates to the establishment of a national foundry for cannon, to be common to the service of the Army and Navy of the United States, be referred to a select committee, to report by bill or otherwise;" which was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER of Tennessee moved to amend, by referring the subject of an armory on the Western waters; which amendment he briefly supported.

Mr. BIDDLE and Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio followed on the opposite side.

Mr. HAYNES then said, that no one held in higher estimation the zeal of his honorable friend from Tennessee (Mr. Carter) than he did. He was very well assured, from his own recollection, and from the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Whittlesey) that the only obstacle heretofore existing to the establishment of an armory upon the Western waters, had been the conflicting interests of individuals representing different localities considered favorable for such an establishment. He was satisfied that this was the only difficulty now existing on this subject. Is it, therefore, probable that this difficulty would be removed, by referring the subject to a select committee, probably enough, constituted of gentlemen representing the conflicting interests already adverted to? That reference had been urged by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Carter) on the ground of analogy to the course just taken by the House on the subject of a cannon foundry for the use and equipment of the Army and Navy. To his mind the honorable gentleman was not borne out by any such analogy. The subject of an armory on the Western waters was one belonging to the peculiar jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs. Not so the subject of the foundry for cannon. That subject is one of common jurisdiction between the Committees on Military and on Naval Affairs. There could not, therefore, be any impropriety in referring it to a select committee. It might further be of importance to send the proposed reference to the Military Committee, not only on the ground of its peculiar jurisdiction, but because it would be free from the influence of those conflicting interests which have so long deferred the establishment of the proposed armory. Further: the mode of proceeding might be wholly different between the Military Committee and the select committee proposed by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee. That select committee might find itself embarrassed by an attempt to select a site for the proposed armory, and might, perhaps, fail to arrive at any practical conclusion upon the subject. The Military Committee might simplify the affair, by proposing a board of commissioners to select a site for the armory, or might confer that authority on the Secretary of War, or the President, whose decision should be final.

He had told some of his friends from the West, in conversation with them on this subject, that they would never obtain their object—the establishment of an armory on the Western waters—while their contest for its location existed. He therefore hoped that the amendment proposed by his honorable friend from Tennessee (Mr. Carter) would not prevail.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MALLARY then moved that the subject be referred to a select committee, consisting of one member from each Atlantic and Gulf State: lost.

Mr. BRIGGS moved the following, which was agreed to:

"Resolved, That so much of the message as relates to a change of the termination of the fiscal year from 1st of October to 1st of April, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means."

The amendment of Mr. HAYNES having been accepted by Mr. BELL, as a modification of his own, was then agreed to, and so amended.

The resolution of Mr. M'KAY was also agreed to.

The orders of the day were then announced, and

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, setting forth the reasons for the delay in the publication of the Biennial Register.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, laid on the table.

The bill from the Senate, entitled An act to provide for the payment of the annuities which have become due and payable to the Great and Little Osage Indians in 1838, and for other purposes, was taken up, read twice, and,

Mr. RARIDEN, on leave, presented the petition of sundry citizens for a mail route from Fort Wayne, Allen county, to Murray, Wells county, thence to Mount Pelican, Jay county, to Muncey Town, Delaware county: referred to a committee. Also, a resolution directing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to inquire into the expediency of establishing a semi-weekly post route from Marian, in Grant county, Indiana, via Wabash Town, via Galleton, to Warsaw.

On motion of Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Purdy, Tennessee, by Smith's Mill, Mattamora, and Ripley, in Tippa county, to Pontotoc, Mississippi.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Mileage, reported a bill amendatory of the "act allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives, of the United States, and Delegates of the Territories, and repealing all other laws on that subject," approved Jan. 22, 1819; which was read twice.

Mr. D. moved its engrossment.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY remarked that the bill seemed to contain some important principles, and moved its commitment to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was agreed to.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution as amended, and passed by a vote of 36 to 8.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, January 11, 1838.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Mr. DORSEY, the Sergeant-at-arms, stating that, on receiving a large sum of money from the Bank of the Metropolis, for the pay of the members at the late special session, there was a deficiency of upwards of $3,800, and that the directors had hitherto neglected to investigate the matter, though one of the board had admitted a surplus of cash in the bank, to about the amount missed by Mr. D. who had hitherto supplied it from his private funds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland alluded to the well known honesty and sense of honor which characterized the Sergeant-at-arms. There could be no doubt but that there was an error on the part of the bank, which would be remedied after a proper investigation.

Mr. THOMAS of Maryland also attested to the high respectability and fidelity of the Sergeant-at-arms, whom he had known for a long period. He alluded to the request made by that officer to the directors of the bank, and contended that ample time had been afforded for them to return an answer. But as they had refused to do so, he was in favor of referring the subject to a select committee.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio had nothing to say against the integrity and honesty of the Sergeant-at-arms, but he hoped that gentlemen would not contrast his honesty with the honesty and fidelity of the officers of the bank who had no hearing in the House. Mr. W. then adverted to what he termed the imprudent manner in which the business of that officer was transacted, by his allowing gentlemen and members of Congress free access to his room, when so much money was in his possession. At the end of the late special session, when he (Mr. W.) saw so much money about, in a room to which all seemed to have access, it appeared inexplicable to him how the business could be transacted without frequent mistakes. For his part, he was not opposed to an investigation; but he considered that the character of the bank directors was as dear to them, as that of the Sergeant-at-arms was to him; and with that view, he objected to a discussion previous to the investigation, when gentlemen were liable to have their minds prepossessed on the subject.

Mr. JENIFER was not aware that any charge had been made against either the Sergeant-at-arms or the officers of the bank. It was evident that a mistake had been made, and the question was, on whose part it lay. Mr J. spoke at some length on the high character and moral worth of the Sergeant at-arms, both in his public and private capacity. He was also willing to speak to the respectability and fidelity of the officers of the bank, as far as he knew them, but the only proper course, in his opinion, was to refer the subject to a committee for proper investigation.

After some brief remarks from Mr. BOND,

Mr. EVERETT thought it very probable that the bank directors would make a report in a very short time, by which the House would be saved much trouble. He therefore moved a postponement of the subject until Tuesday next.

Mr. PEARCE thought it due to the Sergeant-at-arms that an investigation should be made without delay; and, if it shall then appear that there was no blame attached to him, it was no more than just that the House should remunerate him for his loss. He alluded to the necessarily hurried state of business at the end of the session, and the great probability of an unavoidable mistake having been made. He hoped the gentleman from Vermont would withdraw his amendment, and that the subject would be at once referred.

Mr. GLASCOCK considered it absolutely necessary, from the course the discussion had taken, that a reference of the whole matter should be made to a select committee. He considered it not only due to the Sergeant-at-arms and the officers of the bank, but it was equally due from remarks which had been made to the members of this House. One or two gentlemen had observed that the Sergeant-at-arms had transacted his business in rather a loose manner; and from the free access given by him to his room whilst paying off the members, they had looked for such losses. Such a charge, Mr. G. said, amounts to no more nor less than this: that if the Sergeant-at-arms actually received the money from the bank, he must improperly have retained it, or have paid out to the members more than they were entitled to receive, unless, perchance, it was purloined from his room. Under such a state of things, it seemed to him that an inquiry, full and free, should be had into all the circumstances connected with the transaction, and the facts reported to this House. He had doubts himself how far this House could go, but he was desirous that all the facts should be collected, and so soon as they were reported, he had no doubt the proper steps would be taken to do ample justice to all the parties interested; and that all would be relieved from any unjust and improper censure.

Mr. THOMAS again addressed the House in favor a reference to a select committee. He considered the charge of carelessness made against the Sergent-at-arms, as inconsistent. Did they suppose for a moment, that their officer was to exclude members of Congress from his room, lest he should lose part of his funds. He contended that the practice of sending the Sergeant-at-arms with checks to the bank, was contrary to law, and formed no part of duty. After members had received their checks, it was their duty to go to the bank themselves. He alluded to the time already elapsed, and saw no reason for postponement. He was in favor of an immediate reference of the subject to a select committee.

Mr. CRAIG was in favor a reference.

Mr. McKENNAN believed that the Sergeant-at-arms was faithful and honest in the performance of his duty, but the motion to postpone would, in his opinion, be the means of bringing the matter to a much speedier termination than an immediate reference to a committee. He had been informed by one of the directors of the bank that at that time a laborious investigation was making on the subject, and it was probable that a report would be speedily made. The peculiar state of the facts rendered it necessary that there should be a careful investigation. He was informed that this was the first instance when a mistake had occurred between the Sergeant-at-arms and the bank. It had also been customary for the bank, in all former cases, to send a clerk with that officer to assist him in counting the money; but it this instance, it had unfortunately been omitted. Under such circumstances, when an investigation was going on at the bank, and there was every prospect of a speedy report, he was sure that the House would see the propriety of postponing the subject until Tuesday.

Mr. BOULDIN said that some suggestion had been made that this matter ought to go the Committee for the District of Columbia. He said that, as chairman of that committee, it might be proper for him to remark, he could not see what that committee had to do with the subject in its present situation, or what any committee could have to do with it in this shape. If the Sergeant-at-arms thought proper to trust the bank to count his money for him, without recounting it, it was a confidence either well or ill-placed. If ill-placed, Mr. B. did not know what we could do; if well-placed, it was the same. The bank, he said, was no way responsible to the House.

If the Sergeant-at-arms wished his conduct inquired into, he had no objection; but he had heard nobody charge him with any thing. His trusting the bank to count his money for him was no very extraordinary thing; nothing to impeach the conduct or character of the Sergeant-at-arms; the bank being, at the time, in good credit and respectability.

Mr. B. said there was one point of view in which this matter might be properly the subject of investigation. If the bank in question wish to obtain a renewal of their charter, which will shortly expire, it would be very material to know whether they have or have not accounted promptly and fairly and openly with their customers.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. REED, BOND, and MARVIN,

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland moved to amend by increasing the number of members composing the committee to five.

Mr. BRONSON moved the previous question on the motion as amended, but subsequently withdrew it.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone until Tuesday, and rejected.

The question recurring on the motion to refer to a seleet committee,

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved to amend by adding the following instructions:

"With powers to send for persons and papers, and to inquire into the allegations set forth therein, and into the manner of disbursing the money, and whether errors and mistakes were committed, and to what extent any were made, by the Sergeant-at-arms in paying the money at the said session of Congress."

These instructions were agreed to, and so amended the resolution was adopted:

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of W. S. Colquhoun.

Mr. LEWIS of Alabama, on leave, presented several memorials,

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following, viz:

Bill for the relief of James Bailey.

Mr. BOON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported Senate bill, entitled an "act authorizing the States to tax any lands within their limits sold by the United States," accompanied with a statement that the bill had come from the Senate without the signature or usual alteration of the Secretary of that body, and a resolution that a message be sent to the Senate notifying them of the omission, which resolution was concurred in.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the Senate bill, without amendment, entitled "An act to ratify and confirm certain official acts of John Pope, late Governor of Arkansas."

Mr. T. moved its engrossment; which, after some explanation by Mr. POPE, was ordered; and then the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the same committee, reported a bill making further compensation to clerks in the district courts of the United States.

Mr. CORWIN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas M'Clellan and James Smith.

Mr. MUHLENBERG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported Senate bill, with an amendment, for the relief of the heirs of Major Peter Helphenstine.

Also, a bill for the relief of Simeon Summers.

Mr. CRAIG, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas Jett.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas Sumpter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the same committee, reported the following, viz:

A bill to authorize the issuing of land warrants in certain cases.

A bill to authorize the payment of seven years' half-pay to the widows and children of certain officers in the continental line.

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Marshal Rochambeau.

All the above bills, with the exception stated, were read twice, and committed.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The following resolution submitted by Mr. WISE on the 2d inst. was then taken up.

"Resolved, That a committee to consist of ——— members be appointed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the Constitution of the United States as to prohibit the appointment of members of Congress to Executive offices during the time for which they are elected Senators or Representatives, and the time of two years thereafter."

Mr. BELL moved to fill the blank with "nine," which was agreed to, and the resolution was also agreed to.

The following, offered by Mr. LAWLER of Alabama, on the 11th of December, was then taken up:

Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce, according to some equitable scale of graduation, the price of such portions of the public lands as will not sell within a reasonable length of time at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and that the lands which cannot be sold at such reduced prices, after being so offered for the term of — years, should be relinquished to the States severally in which they are situated.

Mr. MERCER suggested that, inasmuch as the Committee on the Public Lands had already reported a bill embracing the objects of this resolution, which was committed to a Committee of the Whole, it had better be referred to the same Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAWLER assenting to the suggestion, the resolution was thus disposed of.

The following, submitted by Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky, on the 18th of December, was taken up and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War and Navy, be directed severally to report to this House the amount of postage paid on letters and papers transmitted from their respective departments by the Express Mail, since its institution.

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to inform this House whether, in estimating the amount of money received for postages on letters and papers transmitted by the Express Mail, he includes any estimate of postages on letters or papers transmitted by that mail from himself or any officer or officers of his Department, having the privilege of franking through the ordinary mail; and if so, what amount of postages on letters and papers from his Department are so included, or is subject to be included, from the first establishment of the Express Mail.

The following, submitted by Mr. MONTGOMERY of North Carolina were taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House—

1st. The whole amount of public lands belonging to the United States sold since they were ceded to the United States; exhibiting the nett proceeds, and distinguishing between those which have been sold within the limits of the different States and Territories.

2d. The whole amount of public lands which have been surveyed and exposed to sale in the several States and Territories, and showing the amount sold and the amount remaining to be sold, according to the last returns.

3d. The amount which has been actually patented in bounties to the Army of the United States.

4th. The amount granted to each of the States and Territories, and for what purpose.

5th. The amount set apart or reserved for schools and other purposes in the several States and Territories.

6th. The amount granted in donations for the cultivation of the vine and olive, and for other purposes, to Gen. Lafayette.

Mr. MERCER moved to add the words distinguishing each year, which Mr. Montgomery accepted as a modification; and, so amended, they were agreed to.

The following, submitted by Mr. MALLORY on the 18th of December, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to cause a continuance of the survey for an inland route between Charleston, S. C. and Norfolk, Va. (authorized by an act of the last Congress,) beginning at the northern termination of the Dismal Swamp Canal, and extending to Hampton Roads, and also the country between the Canal and Gosport, with a view to ascertain the expediency of continuing the canal to that place, or improving the river.

Mr. CAMBRELENG and Mr. MERCER severally suggested that the resolution be referred to some committee to inquire into the expediency of authorizing such a survey; and the latter gentleman moved its reference to that on Roads and Canals, which, after a few words from Mr. MALLORY, was agreed to.

The following, submitted by Mr. SLADE on the 18th ultimo, was then taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement, showing the number of acres of the public lands which have been purchased under laws granting the right of pre-emption, distinguishing the several laws under which, and the several States and Territories in which such purchases have been made. And that he also be directed to communicate any information which may be in possession of his Department touching any associations which may have been formed by intruders on public lands, for the purpose of adjusting their relative rights of occupancy, and putting down competition at the public sales of such lands.

Mr. LYON understood that the clerks in the Land Office had been engaged for some time in preparing a response, embracing all the points referred to in the above, to a similar resolution adopted at the last session; he therefore saw no necessity for adopting the present, and moved its postponement, which was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The following, submitted by Mr. ADAMS, also on the 18th, was then taken up.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a copy and translation of the pamhlet in the Spanish language, stated in the report of the Secretary of State to this House to have been printed and circulated by the late minister from the Republic of Mexico, Gorostiza, before his departure from this country, and the name of the diplomatic functionary from a foreign Government who communicated a copy of said pamphlet to the Secretary of State.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. HOWARD, of Maryland, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, moved to amend it by striking out all that part of it which had reference to a disclosure of the name of the public functionary who communicated to the Secretary of State a copy of Mr. Gorostiza's letter.

Mr. ADAMS hoped that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs would not insist on the motion he had now made, inasmuch as Mr. A. considered the clause proposed to be stricken out as a very material one. It was the language of the report of the Secretary of State himself which had induced Mr. A. to insert that clause. It must (said he) be within the recollection of every member of this House, that the Message of the President of the United States, communicated to this House at the commencement of the present session, bore an exceedingly hostile aspect towards the Republic of Mexico. That in that Message it was stated that the late President of the United States (General Jackson) had sent to Congress a Message, itself very hostile in its character, proposing that he should be empowered to issue letters of marque and reprisal against the Republic of Mexico, and declaring that the relation of that Republic to the United States was such, that this Government would be justified in adopting towards it any measures authorized by the law of nations; (meaning thereby to include a declaration of war,) and that the present Executive had stated that it appeared, from the act of both Houses of Congress, that their opinion in this matter concurred with that of his predecessor. I believe there is on the Speaker's table a resolution of a late date, offered by myself, calling upon the President to inform this House by what act it ever expressed such an opinion. That resolution has not yet come before us for consideration. I hope that when it does, the House will adopt it, and that the President himself will answer the inquiry in a different manner from that in which it was responded to in this House by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I trust that at least the President will not say that the appropriation made by the House for the mission of a minister of peace, is a proof that this House thought it might justly declare war. If the President had no other reason than that to give, I envy not his position before the world and mankind. I hope, however, that the opportunity will be given him to assign a better reason. But in that averment by the Executive, repeated as it is in this report of the Secretary of State, I look not simply at the question of personal veracity on the part of these two great functionaries, but I look also and chiefly to the MOTIVE of that averment. There can be no other but a desire to appeal to the feelings of this nation, by the assertion that the last Congress expressed the opinion that our relations with Mexico were at that time such as would justify us in going to war, and of course that this Congress cannot express a different opinion unless it is prepared to incur questions as to its patriotism, and its disposition to assert and maintain the rights of the nation against that sister Republic. This must be the motive. The object manifestly is to make an indirect appeal to the patriotism of the members of both Houses of Congress; to say, in substance: "How dare you, the members of this Congress, question a position which was taken by your predecessors, and which concurred with mine? How can you deny that we have a right to go to war with Mexico, when as long ago as the last Congress it was decided by both Houses that the nation would be justified in going to any length within the law of nations, and that it was from mere generosity that we abstained from doing so then." It is indeed true that it was suggested that one further step should be taken, to show our extreme love of peace, and the extreme gentleness with which we were disposed to treat our neighboring Republic, viz. the appointment of a special Minister to make a solemn final demand of redress; and if that appeal should fail, we ought then to declare war.

Now the Message and the report of the Secretary both say that this last step has been taken, this final appeal has been made, and has failed. What is the inference? Obviously this: that you have no alternative, and that your duty to the nation you represent, now compels you to take justice into your own hands. I can draw no other conclusion. But I think I have already proved, on a former occasion, that even that last measure has not been taken, though it is so asserted in this document; and not only has it not been taken, but, on the contrary, one of the grossest insults has been offered to Mexico instead of it. But I pass over that, and come to the point in the Secretary's report. That report contains a long argument which is little else than one continual instigation to war; and in that argument there figures this pamphlet. After a long enumeration of grievances, real or imaginary—and I will not say that there are not real claims upon Mexico, and in relation to which, so far as they are just, I am prepared to go as far as any man in sustaining them with the whole power of this nation—there are some statements which I shall notice. In the mean time, I will just say that most assuredly, at the time when the President said that the act of this House was a declaration of its opinion that this Government would be justified in going to war with Mexico, the House knew nothing about the matter. No facts had been presented to it from which to form an opinion, and no examination had been had of any of the grounds of difference. The Secretary says:

"The answer of the Mexican Minister to the demand of the United States, founded upon the conduct of Mr. Gorostiza, is so singular as to require a particular statement of all the facts in relation to the subject of it. Soon after the late Mexican Minister asked for his passports to return home, after terminating his extraordinary mission, his last note to the Department, in which his reasons for taking that step were expressed, was published in New York, in the journal called the 'Courrier des Etats Unis.' This document had never been made public by the authority of the Department. The existence of a pamphlet by Mr. Gorostiza, printed in Philadelphia in Spanish, had been previously made known to the Secretary of State by a member of the diplomatic corps accredited at Washington, who stated that he had received two copies, and he believed that the same number of copies had been transmitted by the author to each member of the foreign diplomatic corps in Washington, expressing, at the same time, his surprise and disgust at the grossness of such an act by a retiring minister."

Now, I must say this is a very extraordinary statement of the Secretary, and I again ask for the motive. What motive could he have in informing the House that he had received a copy of a little pamphlet printed in Spanish by Mr. Gorostiza, in the city of New York? What can be the motive? It is obviously to lay the foundation of a long argument in which the honorable Secretary sets forth this fact as one of the great and commanding reasons why we ought to go to war with Mexico. He presents this as one of the great and enormous outrages against the law of nations; and so violent and unprecedented in its character that this alone would form of itself a legitimate ground for war. The printing by an ex-minister from a foreign Power of a small pamphlet in Spanish, and sending it to the foreign ministers residing here. That is the fact. Then comes a long argument to prove that this is a ground of war; and, as a basis for that argument, the Secretary states to Congress that one of these foreign ministers, in communicating a copy of the pamphlet to him, expressed surprise and disgust at such a proceeding. I ask again, what is the motive of this statement? It is to produce on us the impression that all mankind look upon the publication of that pamphlet as a gross and outrageous proceeding, so offensive that even a foreign Minister must come to the Secretary and act the part of an informer, and tell him I have received such and such a pamphlet from the late Minister from Mexico, and I cannot suppress the expression of my surprise and disgust. Then if a foreign minister was compelled by the violence of the case to consider it his duty to violate all the ties of friendship by turning himself into a common informer, in instigating a friendly Government to war by saying to our Secretary of State, "See here! what a notorious and atrocious violation of the laws of nations has been committed by the Mexican Minister! He has published this pamphlet and sent it to me: I communicate it to you with the expression of my surprise and disgust"—It is meant as a reflection on ourselves. If a foreign minister, who, from his position, is supposed to be perfectly impartial, and the friend of both parties, even thinks it necessary to come to our Government and denounce the act of his late fellow minister, and even to express his surprise and disgust at such a proceeding, what must be the feeling of every native American, the dignity of whose Government has been thus outraged? If an independent, cool, impartial foreigner is driven to this, can any American think of it with patience? Oh, no! There is but one thing to be done. We must at once go to war. First, the fact is laid as a basis, and then comes an argument occupying a great many pages—how many I do not know, but far too many for me to read to the House; the drift of the whole being to prove that an outrage so atrocious can be avenged no other way than in the blood of his countrymen and our own.

Well, sir, suppose the the fact to be as stated; what, then, I ask, must be the character of that foreign minister if he did so? What was he doing? Sir, I will not qualify such an action, because I suppose that there is such a foreign minister resident near this Government; and that he did so communicate the pamphlet, I have no doubt. But if in communicating it he expressed his surprise and disgust at the course of his friend who sent the pamphlet to him, in what office was he engaged as the minister of a friendly power? Here are two countries in a very critical relation toward each other, urging neutral complaints, and approaching to an open rupture. A minister extraordinary is sent from one of these powers to the other. He confers with the Secretary of State on the subject of the national differences, but he finds that their views are so far apart that he cannot succeed in the pacific object of his mission, and at length deems it necessary to demand his passports. On his way home, instead of waiting till he had arrived at Vera Cruz, he employs a printer in New York to print for him a little pamphlet, in which he endeavors to justify his own course and that of his Government. He sends two copies of this pamphlet to a foreign minister resident near the Government from which he has taken his departure. I do not now inquire into the propriety of this step. I am considering merely the conduct of the minister who received and communicated this pamphlet to the American Secretary of State. And I again ask, what office was he performing? All he knows is, that this minister has been unable to agree with our Government; that he has consequently taken his departure, and on his way home has written and printed this pamphlet. He immediately comes to our Secretary, betrays the confidence reposed in him by his associate minister, and attempts to blow the coals of discord between two friendly nations. He says to our Secretary, "There, you must at once go to war. See what treatment your Government has received. The Mexican minister had the audacity to print such a pamphlet as this. There it is, take it, read it, and go to war at once."

That is the exposition which the Secretary has himself put upon this transaction. It is intended as an argument to be addressed to the people of the United States, to make them go to war with Mexico. To what other end could all these circumstances have been communicated? The Secretary was under no obligation to make a communication to this House of the manner in which he got possession of Mr. Gorostiza's pamphlet. It appears to have been sent to him as a confidential communication. He did not, however, so consider it, or he would not have introduced these statements into his report.

He would, under the circumstances, have been very cautious how he stated a fact of this kind, when it was not at all material to his purpose or to the question. He might have stated the fact that such a pamphlet had been published, and might have made his argument from it, without telling this House and nation how he obtained the knowledge. But he has thought proper to put it into his report, and send it by the President to Congress. I can see no motive in this but to influence the minds of the American people against Mexico.

Under these circumstances, I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will not persist in his endeavor to screen the foreign minister here referred to from the gaze of this House and of this people; for here, in my place, I pronounce the act charged upon him by the Secretary a worse and more atrocious outrage than the publication of the pamphlet. I do not justify the printing of the pamphlet; but I do say that that foreign minister, who took it upon him to communicate this pamphlet, with an expression of his surprise and disgust, was guilty of a greater outrage, as well upon the United States as upon Mexico, than Mr. Gorostiza. I hope the honorable chairman will not attempt to screen him. Let us know who he was. He is accredited here as a minister of peace. It is important that he should be known by name to Congress, to this country, and to the world; for we must remember that all we do in relation to this Mexican Republic is done not only before Mexico, but in the face of the civilized world.

There is another reason why I wish to have the name of this individual, and which induces me to hope that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will not insist upon its being withheld. There is a rumor very current in this city, and which has at length made its way to the public papers—I had myself heard it long before—that there is a foreign minister resident here, (I shall not name him,) who had told a number of persons in this city that he did communicate the pamphlet in question to our Secretary, but who positively denies that he expressed either surprise or disgust on the occasion. I wish to bring these two high functionaries into the presence of one another, and let us see where the truth lies. Let us remember that the character of that individual, as a foreign minister resident near our Government, we are bound to protect. As to the mere communication of a copy of the pamphlet, it is in itself an indifferent act. I do not say that in that act, in itself simply considered, there was the smallest degree of impropriety; but, when we consider that the whole statement amounts to a direct charge on his moral character, that it infers treachery toward one who had confided in him, and a disposition to kindle war between two nations in whose affairs he had no right to intermeddle, the matter has a different aspect. Let us have the facts. Let us have the name of the minister. Let the parties be confronted, and then let us see whether that minister will come forward and avow that he did express the sentiments here attributed to him; that he did play the part of an informer, and an inflamer of war. That man I want to see; and I say again, let him be confronted with the man who has thus brought him before Congress. The character of a foreign minister is implicated, and I want information. He is said to have very freely told to more than one individual that he did communicate the pamphlet, but to have positively and utterly denied any expression of surprise or disgust. I hope the honorable chairman will not persist in his motion, but if he does, then I do invoke all the independent spirit in this House not to agree with him. It is a matter which concerns this nation, which concerns the peace of Mexico, which concerns the peace of the world.

Mr. HOWARD said that he could not, for a moment, think of withdrawing his motion; he had heard nothing to convince him of the propriety of doing so. If the House chose to retain the clause calling for the name of this individual, they would, of course, do so; that was a matter for them to determine; but Mr. H. must regulate his own course by his own views of propriety. As to the pamphlet itself, (said Mr. H.) I have no great objection that the gentleman from Massachusetts should call for a copy, though it seems to me very unnecessary, because the book is sold in the public book stores, and I have no doubt as many copies can be obtained as any gentleman desires. I purchased one for myself last winter. But if the gentleman thinks that that which purports to be a translation was not in reality such, and he wishes a translation made, I shall not oppose it. I have no wish to use harsh language toward any man, but I am compelled by truth to say that a more atrocious libel on the people and Government of the United States never was published. This is my deliberate opinion. I read the book with feelings of indignation, which even now arise anew in my bosom, thought it is months ago. Yet that is the pamphlet which it was attempted insidiously to circulate among all the civilized powers of the world, by a man who took advantage of his public situation to perpetrate such an act.

The gentleman talks about a violation of confidence. Where is there the slightest ground to believe that the least degree of personal confidence or friendship existed between that man and the individual to whom he gave two copies of his pamphlet? Where is the proof? I know of none. It would appear that copies were given to all the foreign ministers. Was Mr. Gorostiza in habits of strict confidence and personal friendship with all of them? The individual who communicated the pamphlet to our Secretary of State did what it was his duty to do as the representative of a friendly power. At least there is no doubt that he thought so. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts wishes to drag him up before this House as an incendiary, who was occupied in blowing the coals of discord between two nations. And, while he represents the act of communicating this pamphlet as a betrayal of confidence, (of which there is no evidence,) at the same time he does not pretend to justify the publication of the pamphlet, he expressly declared that he could not justify, and perhaps not even palliate it. Now, ought not this Government to know when an appeal full of the foulest falsehood is clandestinely made to the representatives of all other Governments against its acts? Should not a Government, under such circumstances, be warned by the minister of a friendly power? Was it not fit that the representatives of this Government should be apprized of this underhanded, secret attempt to take away our fair fame? Yet the gentleman, for this, insists upon confronting him with the Secretary of State, and declares the act of making such a communication a more atrocious outrage than the publication of the pamphlet. Supposing it to be so, what does the gentleman want to do? Does he seek to embroil that minister and his Government with the Government of Mexico, as if there were not already quarrels enough in the world? He wants to hold him up to public scorn and reprobation, and, I suppose, to make his Government responsible for his conduct, thus increasing our difficulties with other powers. Why should we do this? Has this House any doubt as to the truth of the fact stated by the Secretary? If that gentleman is to be put upon a public trial on a question of veracity, that is a different affair.

If the House has any doubt, let them investigate; but if they believe the Secretary of State, (an officer of this Government, whose word is not likely to be doubted,) why should they, without authority, because there is a rumor that some public minister has said something to somebody at some time, and some letter-writer has caught it up, and it has appeared on anonymous authority in some paper, pass a vote which implies a doubt of his veracity? Newspapers seem to have risen into vast magnitude and importance of late.

As to the condition of our dispute with Mexico, and the clause to which the gentleman has alluded in the Message of the President, I have only to say that that subject is not now before this House. It will be in due time, and I feel desirous that it should come up for discussion. I have heard this Administration denounced as being the true cause of our Canadian troubles, from the course it has pursued towards Mexico, and I have heard it openly declared on this floor that our Government has disgraced the country. I hold gentlemen to the proof. This sort of general denunciation will not do; though it may please certain gentlemen to represent the country as disgraced, and to charge every thing on the Administration, the people will require proof. I ask, what statute is it which the Government has omitted to enforce? I call upon gentlemen to show it to me. I demand to see that act of Congress which requires this Government to go farther than it has gone in preserving our neutrality in all its relations with Mexico. Let the gentlemen put their finger on the statutory provision which has been neglected to be enforced. Then, and not till then, shall I be ready to say that the Government has been disgraced. I cannot find any provision which requires the President to walk over the Constitution, and by his own authority seize upon every body that he thought intended to go to Texas. The gentlemen, I presume, will hardly expect this after the extraordinary sensibility they have manifested in regard to what they call infractions of the Constitution. Will they make it matter of complaint that the Executive has conformed himself to the law of the land? If reference is made to the act of 1818, I can find only two sections of that act which at all apply to the case, and these have been strictly carried into execution, whenever the occasion called for it, and the Government was informed of their violation.

But, to return to the point immediately before the House. Why should we demand the name of this minister? What good reason can be given for it? If the communication made by the retiring minister to the minister in question was made in confidence, is there not the same reason to suppose that the communication of the latter with the Secretary of State was in confidence also? Why suppose one to have been confidential, and not the other? In my judgment, neither of them was so. I see in the circumstances no mark of any such thing. Copies of the pamphlet were, I believe, communicated to all the members of the diplomatic corps. Until I shall be satisfied that there is some good reason for this demand, I cannot assent to it. I do not desire to extend the controversy any farther. The retiring minister appeals to a great Congress of nations. Why, sir, we have such a Congress in every civilized country. The diplomatic corps, accredited to any one of the great Governments of Europe, form in themselves a Congress of Nations, and to that tribunal this man made a secret appeal, with the intention of forestalling the question. He sends his atrociously slanderous pamphlet to all the Representatives of Governments in friendly communication with the United States, holding up to them this Government as having asserted an untruth. Are we to lose the favorable opinion of every friendly Government because he chose to avail himself of the last privilege within his reach to scatter his slanders over the whole civilized world?

Mr. MENEFEE said that he presumed the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. Howard] had honored him by his allusion to the conduct of the Government in the maintenance of the neutrality of our citizens toward Mexico in the progress of the Texas revolt. The frightful forms of libel and detraction, excited in his imagination by the pamphlet of Gorostiza, seems to impart, in his eye, a sort of libellous coloring to all that is here said which denies to the Government a title to canonization for its saintship throughout our Mexican relations. He should not complain of the gentleman for indulging in this manner an imagination morbidly, it struck him, inflamed, over matters of national scandal. It was innocent enough, though perhaps not exactly amiable. But the gentleman at last ventures, rashly, he [Mr. M.] must think, to deny in cold blood the imputation against the Government, of either culpable remissness, or the least bad faith in the performance of our neutral and treaty obligations to Mexico. But, more rashly still, he ventures to proclaim, in all the solemn forms of political, and, from his position, semi-official flourish, that gentlemen in the opposition who cast such grievous and unmerited reproach upon the Government will, in due time, be required to specify and establish the grounds which justify such accusations. It was to him [Mr. M.] a source of profound satisfaction, that the Government had thus, in substance, invited public scrutiny into its transactions in that quarter. Now, to him, [Mr. M.] it presented no difficulty whatever to specify or establish more than enough to infamize, utterly, the course of the Administration. His difficulty lay in crediting that any intelligent citizen of the United States, much less the distinguished head of the Committee on Foreign Relations, could be found willing to deny or doubt that the course of the Administration, both as to omission and commission, had been as we have described it. He even yet hoped that the honorable chairman was, in what he said, disposed to be facetious. Why, sir, said he, when I affirm that our citizens throughout the whole West and Southwest violated flagrantly their obligations of neutrality to Mexico, by affording public succor, in men and arms, to Texas, from the first stage of the revolt to the recognition of its independence, I have but to refer to the Representatives from that section of the Union. That military array, in no concealed form, but in all "the pomp and circumstance" of war, was the spectacle of every day; that avowed military recruiting, by commissioned officers, for the defence of Texas; that the character of emigrant, claiming the right of expatriation, first assumed, soon rose to that of soldier; that bodies of men with arms, uniforms, and standards, and every quality of organized military force, breathing war and vengeance against a friendly power, were publicly displayed in the heart of this country, in almost every city and village in its confines; that all this was known to the Government from the beginning of the revolt; that it transpired under the immediate observation, and often under the express countenance of the law officers of the Government; that a pretence of boundary was most unreasonably set up by the Government; that a military force was passed into Mexican territory at a most critical period of the revolt: these, sir, and multitudes of others, are my specifications, and the West and Southwest here assembled are my proofs!

Let gentlemen beware: there is more in these Mexican relations than this intemperate justification of them seems to perceive. On a fit occasion they may be developed.

But the chairman says there was no law which the Executive did not enforce; nothing undone which he could do. Does not the act of 1818, for the enforcement of neutral obligations, authorize the suppression of military expeditions, or preparations here, against a power with whom we are at peace? Look at it. Every provision almost has been violated, and not one clause enforced, or attempted, except in empty form. But suppose the law was not sufficiently comprehensive in its provisions? Why did not the Executive, charged with the conduct of our foreign relations, communicate the fact to Congress, and ask their extension? It is our duty to compel our citizens to do justice to other nations. Other nations have a right to demand that we should, and we are nationally responsible if we do not. Have you not lately done so in the case of the Canada revolt? Were not the aggressions of our citizens against Mexico more reiterated in number, and longer persisted in, than they have been against Great Britain? Why, then, distinguish between the two powers? Is it because Mexico was weak that you declined this course towards her? Is it because Great Britain is powerful that you fly with this haste—almost indecent—to the frontier, find the laws not adequate, and present yourself before Congress for increased authority? This is but justice to Great Britain. Yet why was not the same measure of justice extended to Mexico? How can you, under these circumstances, escape the suspicion of the civilized world, that you have at once yielded to the power of a great monarchy what you denied to an infant and distracted republic? That the power of Great Britain has wrung from you a justice which, under your sense of principle and treaty, you would not allow to Mexico? That your measure of justice is graduated by the power of the nations to whom you administer it? There is no humiliation or dishonor in doing justice to Great Britain now; the humiliation and dishonor lie in having withheld it from Mexico under like circumstances.

Before this affair is closed, I hope to be able to do myself the honor to afford the honorable chairman specifications quite as exact as he may desire, "accompanied with competent proofs;" for his due consideration of which, I shall feel at liberty to allow him more than a week, if required—the time lately allowed a foreign Government, not so powerful as Great Britain, to determine on a multitude of intricate and complex subjects, involving the issues of peace and war.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON said that he cared not how hard a blow might fall on this or the last Administration, provided it was not struck in favor of Mexico against the interests of Texas, nor struck at the Administration through the national honor. Much as he had denounced the conduct of the Administration, he had not forgotten what it behooved every American, in all controversies with foreign powers to remember, that still it was the Government of his country. He would say, that could he conceive it possible he should himself ever live to charge his native country with meanness and cowardice, with violence towards the feeble, and a base truckling to the strong, it would not be in circumstances when that strong power had its arms yet reeking with the slaughter of American citizens. Men, he was aware, might be so far gone in party spirit as to take a pleasure in representing their country in the meanest and most disgraceful light to disparage a hated Administration. He must confess that, fell as was his revenge against the present and late Administration, he had no "stomach" for that.

The gentleman had inquired why, in the case of Texas, the Executive had not asked for additional powers to guard against violations of our neutrality, as he had recently done in case of England. The answer was obvious. Texas was remotely situated. It was separated from us by a wide region of wilderness, and no power could entirely prevent the evil complained of. But, on our Northern frontier, we were separated from Canada, sometimes, but by a narrow stream, while the boundaries of both countries were bordered by fortresses. The inhabitants on both sides were in a state of the greatest excitement, and had already broken out into mutual outrages. The two cases were obviously different. Laws which might have been strong enough in the case of Texas, were insufficient with regard to Canada. Deep as was Mr. T's indignation at the enormity which had been perpetrated at Schlosser, he did not deny the obligations of this Government to maintain the relations of neutrality.

Now, as to the charge which had been made of cowardice in our course towards Mexico, he believed it was the first time, much as party violence had prevailed in our country, that cowardice had ever been connected with the name of Andrew Jackson. Whatever evils that individual might have inflicted on his country, no candid man would deny that he had spread around the American name a halo of military glory; and, if remarkable above other men for any one quality, it was for an indomitable courage that blenched at no danger. Andrew Jackson! not dare to observe the same course toward Great Britain as he would toward Texas. Yes: if he would hesitate in regard to either, it would never be in respect to the stronger power. He would have been more prompt to assume a bold front to the strong than to the weak, to England than to Mexico. His blood would "more have stirred to rouse a lion than to start a hare." But what could the Government have done? The case stated by the gentleman from Kentucky did not fall within the provisions of the law of 1818. Had the Government any proof that a military expedition had been fitted out in the United States against a friendly power? The gentleman had spoken of recruiting; but Mr. T. would like to see the terms of enlistment; he rather believed it would turn out, on examination, that the men were only invited to go and settle a new country. The gentleman talked of a recruiting rendezvous at Lexington. Indeed! and where were the loyal citizens of the State of Kentucky, that they permitted all this to go on? Was there no patriotic citizen to warn the Administration of the danger, as the ever-glorious and lamented Colonel Daviess informed Mr. Jefferson of Burr's movements? Where was the slumbering patriotism, the sense of honor, in the authorities of Kentucky, if they could stand by and see the laws thus flagrantly violated? Why had not the honorable gentleman himself stepped forward and informed the Executive Department of a state of things so outrageous? There was the law; the gentleman said it covered the case; if so, there was wanting only an informer to put it into effect. But suppose the gentleman had been himself the District Attorney for the District of Kentucky, what could he have done? Suppose Mr. T. had been one of those recruited, could the gentleman have arrested him? If he had, and Mr. T. had inquired his authority, he would have replied, "I arrest you because I believe you are going to Texas." Mr. T. would have answered, "Well; and what if I am? Have I not a right to go to Texas, if I choose to remove to that country?" "Yes; but you are in arms; you mean to fight against Mexico as soon as you get there." "Well; and if, when I am a resident of Texas, I choose to fight for my adopted country against her oppressors, can you hinder me?" Mr. T. insisted that if the Government had had the entire military power of the United States there on the ground, it could not have prevented one of these emigrants from removing over the line. They had a right to emigrate, and, having emigrated, they had a right to bear arms in their new country. Any attempt to prevent it must have proved futile, and have only resulted in the promotion of that which it sought to hinder; and, after all, what violation of neutrality had been committed? What had the Government done? Mr. T. had observed from the beginning the whole struggle of that glorious people, and again he asked, what had this Government done for them? It had sent Gen. Gaines across the line. But was this to keep the Camanches off the Texans? No: but off the Mexicans, their old enemies. Those troops had been detailed to preserve the country from the inroad of savages, and Gen. Gaines had done nothing more than, in the like circumstances, would have been done by any gallant man. As to the Government, it had written letter after letter to the District Attorney, urging him to the performance of his duty. If there was a recruiting rendezvous at Lexington, how could the Government know it unless officially informed of it? And it if had been informed, what right would an American Government officer have had to turn back emigrants on their way to Texas, because they chose to have a red stripe on their pantaloons? If they had, it was something new to Mr. T. He had carefully reviewed his own course to see whether he had taken any step in relation to this matter with which he could reproach himself, before he had ventured to go forward and break a lance in defence of the Administration; and if, in so delicate a case, he had appeared as a defender of the Administration, it was only because he had heard his own Government charged with having yielded, out of fear of Great Britain, that which had been denied to the weakness of Mexico, and with suffering that to be extorted from it by the dread of British power, which was not prompted by a sense of honorable justice to a weaker power.

Mr. HAYNES said that if he had not so often, and on such a variety of occasions, heard imputations cast upon the motives of others, and by no member of this House more often, or on a greater variety of occasions, than by the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) he should not now address the House.

It seemed to him that, amidst all the questions involved in our foreign relations, that honorable member had fixed his attention upon a single subject, and that his meat, and drink, and sleep, were continually mingled with Texas! Texas!! Texas!!! Mr. H. was willing to make allowance for the effect of long continued thought and feeling in one particular direction; but, with all due allowance for the influence of such thought and feeling on the part of the member from Massachusetts, he could find no justification for the course which that gentleman had thought proper to pursue.

That gentleman had chosen to raise a question of veracity with the President, touching the action and opinion of Congress upon our then existing relations with Mexico. He did not know on what particular ground the President had placed the opinion or assertion in the Message, which had called down the animadversions of the member from Massachusetts. But, to his mind, it was justified by the language used in the clause of the act of the last session of Congress, making an appropriation for the contingent renewal of diplomatic intercourse with Mexico. That appropriation was made upon the contingency that the money should be expended "whenever, in the opinion of the Executive, circumstances will permit a renewal of intercourse honorably with that power." Our relations with Mexico were then such that diplomatic intercourse could not be honorably renewed with her. If, then, it was not honorable to renew such intercourse, would it have been dishonorable to have taken justice into our own hands?

It was surprising that a gentleman who was so sensitive about violations of confidence, should propose a course calculated to carry out and perfect such violation. He had understood the gentleman from Massachusetts, in the earlier portion of his remarks, to lay down the doctrine, that whatever may be communicated in confidence, whether treason or murder, or any thing else, must be kept sacredly confidential. He had somewhat qualified that doctrine in his subsequent remarks, but how far it affected the general proposition might well be doubted. He asked if it was proper to close up the avenue to confidential information from the members of the diplomatic corps, by dragging every such communication before the country and the world?

For his part, he should not consent to do so. Such a course might sometimes operate most injuriously upon the interests of this country. But as the honorable gentleman had raised a question of veracity with the President, it was now his object to raise such a question with the Secretary of State; and upon what ground did he propose to raise it? Upon rumor. Sir, you may hear rumors of every complexion touching every body, if you choose to listen to them. For his part, he would not indulge the member from Massachusetts in bringing up such an issue with a public officer who had continued to fill high offices for nearly twenty-five years with credit to himself and usefulness to the country, upon any one of the ten thousand rumors in daily circulation here or elsewhere. He, therefore, hoped that the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Howard,) would prevail.

The subject was then laid over to enable the SPEAKER to present some Executive communications:

1. From the Secretary of the Navy, a statement of the number of Clerks employed in the Navy Department.

2. A similar statement from the Secretary of the Treasury.

3. A report from the Secretary of War of the number of persons whose claims for pensions have been rejected during the last year.

4. From the same, a report in relation to some private claim.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

The consideration of Mr. CALHOUN'S resolutions was then resumed.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked, that as he had yesterday pledged himself to bring forward the additional resolution offered yesterday and suspended at his suggestion: in fulfilment of this pledge, he had restored the resolution to its original form, and would now deliver it up to its parents, the honorable Senators from Kentucky and Michigan.

Mr. CLAY, at the suggestion of Mr. SEVIER, assented to an amendment, by striking out the clause relating to the treaty with Spain of 1819.

Mr. CLAY proposed further to amend, by striking out such parts as relates to the Indians, except in cases where, by their influence, the institution of slavery has extended north of the compromise line.—[36 deg. 30 min. N. lat.]

Mr. SEVIER opposed this motion, and called for the yeas and nays, and on the question being taken, the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Merrick, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roan, Robbins, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Williams, and Young—31.

just apprehension in the States sustaining that domestic institution; would be a violation of good faith towards the inhabitants of such Territory, who have been permitted to settle with and hold slaves, because the people of such Territory have not asked for the abolition of slavery therein, and because that, when any such Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the people thereof will be entitled to decide that question exclusively for themselves.

The question was then taken on its adoption, and carried by a vote of of 34 to 9.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 12, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the Mississippi Election case, which he moved to lay on the table and print.

The report was merely on the facts, and was submitted by the committee without comment or inference.

Mr. MAURY said he wished to submit a resolution, but it was not in order.

Mr. GRENNELL wished to have the report committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BELL inquired of the Chair whether, if the motion to lay on the table were decided in the affirmative, it would again come up?

The CHAIR replied it would, when reached on the calendar.

Mr. BELL hoped the gentleman would not press the motion, but consent to its commitment.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he made the motion under the instruction of the committee. Moreover, the report itself came to no definite conclusion, and contained nothing upon which the House could act, being merely a statement of facts, such as they were directed to bring forward.

After several suggestions—

Mr. B. modified his motion by moving to postpone the further consideration of the report till Tuesday next, and that it be printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making an appropriation for the protection of the northern frontier of the United States.

On motion of Mr. B. the bill was committed, and then, on his motion, also, the House went into committee on the same, Mr. McKAY in the chair.

Mr. B. briefly explained that the suffering condition of these Indians was such that depredations and mischief were likely to arise on the one hand, or starvation on the other.

The bill was then considered, when the committee rose and reported it to the House; and it was ordered to a third reading, and then read a third time and passed.

44. A bill for the relief of Isaac Wellborn, jr.

The committee then rose, and reported all the above bills except except Nos. 23 and 31 in the above list, on which the committee had leave to sit again.

Bill N. 22, for the relief of Robert Fulton, was, on motion of Mr. McKAY, postponed till to-morrow, and all the others were ordered to a third reading to-morrow; and then,

On motion,

The House adjourned,

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, January 12, 1838.

Mr. GRUNDY rose and remarked, that, by some mistake in the reports of a morning paper, he had been made to vote against the adoption of the resolution last acted upon previous to the adjournment of last evening, when he was really absent. He therefore asked leave to record his vote on the other side; which leave being granted by unanimous consent, his vote was recorded in the affirmative.*

The CHAIR presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury. Also, one from the same, relative to the various expenditures of the past year. Also, from the Secretary of War. Also, from the Secretary of the Navy, relative to the number of clerks, and their several salaries, employed in that department. Severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the petition of numerous citizens of Delaware, for the establishment of New Castle as a port of entry: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the remonstrance of several marine insurance officers of New York, against the repeal or modification of the law of the last session relating to pilots: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the memorial of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce in favor of establishing New Castle a port of entry, was taken from the files of the last session, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, with amendments, a bill to establish the southern boundary of Wisconsin Territory: amendments adopted.

Also, reported adverse to the petition of Thomas Atherton: adopted.

Also, adverse to the petition of sundry merchants of Mobile, for remission of fees of suit in case of duty bonds.

Mr. KING remarked, that the committee had made a remarkably short report; he wished the chairman would oblige him by giving his reasons.

Mr. GRUNDY replied: for the best reason in the world. There was no reason set forth in the memorial which stated why their prayer ought to be granted. It was not the duty of the Committee to search for reasons which were not known to exist.

Mr. KING remarked, that the law authorizing the extension of bonds on duties, had proved in many cases in effect worse than useless. It was on account of the enormous fees required by the prosecuting officer. It was never contemplated in the passage of the law that for an extension for a few months, the merchant was doomed to pay four or five hundred dollars. The object of the law was to relieve not to distress the merchants.

Mr. GRUNDY explained.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama felt some interest in the matter, and as he had not had an opportunity of examining the papers, which he wished to do before the question was taken, he moved that the report be laid on the table: agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported without amendment,

Bill for the relief of J. W. Jacob, of Charleston, South Carolina,

Bill for the relief of Daniel Davis.

Bill for the relief of Hannah Bradbury.

Bill for the relief of Capt W. Bell;

And on the latter moved an indefinite postponement.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD,

The same committee were discharged from the consideration of the petition of D. J. Patterson, and the same referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to amend the act establishing the northern boundary of Ohio, &c. Ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON, from the committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill for the relief of W. R. Taylor, administrator of Jonathan Taylor;

Also, a bill for the relief of Capt. S. Sanderson;

Also, a bill for the relief of Bailey and Delord; which were severally ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Anthony Yale: ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS reported a bill authorizing the building an hospital in the District of Columbia for the insane, and for other purposes; with a proviso, "that the whole expense of erecting and finishing such building shall not exceed $75,000:" ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CALHOUN'S sixth and last resolution was then taken up, when Mr. Calhoun supported it with a few preliminary observations.

Mr. PRESTON moved to lay the resolution on the table, giving the reasons on which he founded his motion; on which a short debate ensued; after which

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and carried by a vote of 35 to 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, Williams, and Wright—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Lumpkin, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, and Young—9.

The following is a copy of these resolutions, as they passed the Senate:

1. Resolved, That, in the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the States adopting the same acted, severally, as free, independent, and sovereign States; and that each, for itself, by its own voluntary assent, entered the Union with the view to its increased security against all dangers, domestic as well as foreign, and the more perfect and secure enjoyment of its advantages, natural, political, and social.

II. Resolved, That in delegating a portion of their powers to be exercised by the Federal Government, the States retained, severally, the exclusive and sole right over their own domestic institutions and police to the full extent to which those powers were not thus delegated, and are alone responsible for them; and that any intermeddling of any one or more States, or a combination of their citizens, with the domestic institutions and police of the others, on any ground, political, moral, or religious, or under any pretext whatever, with the view to their alteration or subversion, is not warranted by the Constitution, tending to endanger the domestic peace and tranquillity of the States interfered with, subversive of the objects for which the Constitution was formed, and, by necessary consequence, tending to weaken and destroy the Union itself.

III. Resolved, That this Government was instituted and adopted by the several States of this Union as a common agent, in order to carry into effect the powers which they had delegated by the Constitution for their mutual security and prosperity; and that in fulfilment of this high and sacred trust, this Government is bound so to exercise its powers, as not to interfere with the stability and security of the domestic institutions of the States that compose the Union; and that it is the solemn duty of the Government to resist, to the extent of its constitutional power, all attempts by one portion of the Union to use it as an instrument to attack the domestic institutions of another, or to weaken or destroy such institutions.

IV. Resolved, That domestic slavery, as it exists in the Southern and Western States of this Union, composes an important part of their domestic institutions, inherited from their ancestors, and existing at the adoption of the Constitution, by which it is recognised as constituting an important element in the apportionment of powers among the States, and that no change of opinion or feeling, on the part of the other States of the Union in relation to it, can justify them or their citizens in open and systematic attacks thereon, with the view to its overthrow; and that all such attacks are in manifest violation of the mutual and solemn pledge to protect and defend each other, given by the States respectively, on entering into the constitutional compact which formed the Union, and as such are a manifest breach of faith, and a violation of the most solemn obligations.

V. Resolved, That the interference by the citizens of any of the States, with the view to the abolition of slavery in this District, is endangering the rights and security of the people of the District; and that any act or measure of Congress designed to abolish slavery in this District, would be a violation of the faith implied in the cessions by the States of Virginia and Maryland, a just cause of alarm to the people of the slaveholding States, and have a direct and inevitable tendency to disturb and endanger the Union.

And resolved, That any attempt of Congress to abolish slavery in any Territory of the United States in which it exists, would create serious alarm, and just apprehension, in the States sustaining that domestic institution; would be a violation of good faith towards the inhabitants of any such Territory who have been permitted to settle with, and hold slaves therein, because the people of any such Territory have not asked for the abolition of slavery therein, and because when any such Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the people thereof will be entitled to decide that question exclusively for themselves.

Mr. ALLEN then moved to append the following resolution:

Resolved, That nothing in the foregoing resolutions is intended to recognise the right of Congress to impair in any manner the freedom of speech, of the press, or the right of petition, as secured by the Constitution to the citizens of the several States within the States respectively.

On this question a long and animated discussion took place, in which Messrs. SMITH of Indiana, MORRIS, ALLEN, WALKER, and others, participated.

Mr. ALLEN proposed to modify his resolution, by striking out all after the word "Constitution," and to insert, "of the United States, and of the States respectively, to their citizens."

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved to amend Mr. ALLEN'S proposition, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"That nothing in these resolutions should be construed or understood as intending to impair, or in any manner abridge the right of speech or of the people, or the right of petition, as secured by the Constitution of the United States, and the several States, and the right of petition is hereby expressly declared to include the duty on the part of Congress to receive and determine upon the prayer of the petitioners."

This amendment also occasioned some further discussion, when Mr. SMITH proposed so to amend it as to read:

"That nothing in those resolutions shall be construed or understood as intending to impair or in any manner abridge the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of petition, which is hereby expressly declared to include the duty on the part of the Senate to receive and determine upon the petitions."

Pending the discussion,

Mr. NILES moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table; and on this question the yeas and nays were called, when there appeared for the motion, 23; against it, 21—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Lumpkin, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Sevier, Strange, Walker, and White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Morriss, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Williams, and Young—21.

Mr. WALKER moved that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to Monday next.

The Senate then adjourned.

---

*One of the Reporters of the Globe, in the hurry of taking the yeas and nays on the adoption of Mr. CLAY'S amendment to Mr. CALHOUN'S fifth resolution, inadvertently placed the name of Mr. GRUNDY in the negative. That gentleman did not vote at the time. The Reporter hastens to repair the error, by presenting the vote, corrected from the Secretary's record, which is as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black,

Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Ken. Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Knight, McKean, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Webster—9.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 13, 1838.

Mr. TOUCEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an unfavorable report in the case of Thomas Chapman.

Mr. COLES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made an unfavorable report in the case of Sylvester Day.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill to amend the act entitled an act for the relief of James Steele, approved 28th June, 1836, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Pamela Brown, widow of the late Major General Jacob Brown.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked leave of the House to make a few remarks explanatory of his statements relative to the Postmaster General, contained in his speech as reported and published in the National Intelligencer of the 9th instant.

The House having unanimously granted leave,

Mr. U. said he had been unexpectedly called on in the course of debate, to explain a passing allusion he had made to old transactions, in which the Postmaster General took an active part, and which at the time produced a very deep sensation in Kentucky; that, in compliance with the call, he had made a statement from his best recollection at the moment. Since then, he had conversed with other gentlemen from Kentucky, whose opportunities to know and understand the facts were equal, if not superior, to his own. From such conversations and his own reflections, (said Mr. U.) I have become satisfied that so much of my former statement as holds out the idea that the Postmaster General was to "mould and touch" a pamphlet, wrote or to be written by Beauchamp, abusive of the Old Court party, or implicating any of them in the murder of Colonel Sharp, as the price or terms upon which a pardon was to be granted, is erroneous. I now believe the letter, in which the Postmaster General used the words "mould and touch," was written after Beauchamp's execution, and consequently could have furnished no evidence of a willingness to combine with Beauchamp, then dead, in efforts to procure his pardon as a reward for political services. That letter, from my present information, related to a manuscript left by Beauchamp, purporting to be his confession. It was repeatedly charged upon Mr. Kendall in the public journals of that day, that his motive in desiring to "mould and touch" the confession was corrupt; and from the course which the Argus had taken, the Old Court party, so far as my information extended, believed that Mr. Kendall had a sinister political object in view in his proposition to "mould and touch." Such was my opinion then, and I still retain it.

In speaking of these transactions of so many years' standing, it can scarcely be presumed that I should precisely recollect every circumstance. I have deemed it a duty to myself to correct the mistake into which I have fallen, as far as my subsequent information and reflection show to be proper.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio suggested that the House now proceed to the private bills.

Mr. CAMBRELENG objected, because he preferred occupying the morning hour with the public business.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, on leave, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving the act of Congress authorizing all persons owning lands on water courses in the State of Louisiana to enter the lands in the rear of their front concessions; and into the expediency of authorizing all such claimants of land on the said water courses as may be unable to obtain, in the rear of their claims, the quantity of lands contained in their front tracts, by reason of bends in the water courses on which they are situated, or other causes, to make their entries on other public lands in the vicinity of their front claims.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution submitted by Mr. ADAMS on the 18th ult.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a copy and translation of the pamphlet in the Spanish language, stated in the report of the Secretary of State to this House, to have been printed and circulated by the late Minister from the Republic of Mexico, Gorostiza, before his departure from this country, and the name of a diplomatic functionary from a foreign Government who communicated a copy of said pamphlet to the Secretary of State.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HOWARD to strike out all that part relating to the name of the diplomatic functionary, after the word "country," in the eighth line.

Mr. SHIELDS did not rise for the purpose of entering into the merits of the whole subject under debate, but solely for the purpose of repelling and protesting against the allegations which had been made against the citizens of the southwest in relation to the revolution in Texas. With regard to the resolution itself, he did not see of what benefit it could be to the country, as its principal object was to call for a copy of a pamphlet, every word of which had been already read by every member of the House. But he had risen to protest against certain conclusions which had been drawn, reflecting on the conduct of citizens whom he had the honor to represent. It had been asserted in the course of debate, that the citizens of the southwest had participated in the affairs of Texas, in direct violation of the laws of neutrality between this country and Mexico. Such was not the case. He would contradict the charge, and affirm that the citizens of the Southwest had neither in point of fact or law participated in the revolution of Texas. He would assert that there was not one man in fifty who left the United States for Texas, but who went with the bona fide intention of becoming a citizen of Texas. It was true they had taken with them arms and ammunition, but this was after they had expatriated themselves; and were they, under those circumstances, to be blamed for carrying means with them to defend the country of their adoption? Such individuals as went from that quarter were no longer our citizens: they were citizens of Texas, and from the first had engaged in that cause with the bona fide intention of uniting themselves with that Government. But there was not the least comparison between the circumstances attending the movements in the southwest, and those of the northern frontier. The individuals who left the United States to render assistance to Texas did so after the war had commenced, and were invited so to do by the Government of Texas. They therefore could not be charged with violating the laws of Texas, because they had merely accepted an invitation held out to them by that Government; and by that act he protested that they had not broken one solitary law of the United States, as there was nothing to prevent persons from expatriating themselves, and becoming citizens of another country, if they thought proper. But how was it with the North? There the matter was widely different. A portion of our citizens had, uninvited, entered the territory of a foreign power, with the avowed intention of carrying on a war, under aggravating circumstances, calculated to disturb the harmony between the two countries. Mr. S. went into a detailed statement of the affairs of our Canada border, for the purpose of showing there was not the slightest ground for instituting a parallel between the conduct of our citizens in that quarter, and that of the people of the southwest in relation to Texas.

Mr. HOLSEY did not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of the proposition immediately before the House, but simply to reply to the observations of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Menifee,) who had on a previous day, when this resolution was under discussion, charged the late Administration with a breach of neutral relations with the Government of Mexico. He denied the imputation, and invited that gentleman to lay his finger upon a single instance in which this Government had failed to act in strict conformity to the laws of nations. There are but two modes of deriving neutral obligations—one from the conventional, the other from the natural and necessary law of nations. Will the gentleman from Kentucky produce the treaty of neutrality between the two powers? The subsisting treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, is not of that character. It does, indeed, define the rights and obligations of neutrals, whilst the parties choose to retain that character, but does not bind either of the parties to remain neutral in a contest with a third power. The treaty establishes the rights and privileges of neutrals, but the question, who are neutrals? it leaves to be decided by the natural law of nations. By this law you remain neutral so long as you extend to the belligerants equal privileges. You shall not deny to one, in consequence of the war, what you grant to the other. It is not a violation of neutrality to permit one of the belligerants to enlist troops within your dominions, provided you do not exclude the other. The nations of Europe engaged in war, enter the Republic of Switzerland and enlist her citizens, whilst none of the belligerants ever complain of such permission as a breach of neutrality. Let us, then, apply the law to the facts of the case before us. I shall take the strongest case put by the gentleman from Kentucky, of the officers of Texas enlisting soldiers within our jurisdiction. Now this is a privilege granted, we will suppose, to one of the belligerants. Has it been refused to the other? Has any discrimination between the parties been made by the Government? It is true, sir, that the act of 1818 excludes both parties from recruiting within our limits. But this act is a domestic regulation—it prohibits that which the law of nations permits. A relaxation of that policy concerns this nation exclusively. With its execution or non-execution foreign nations have nothing to do. All that they demand when in a state of war, is that the door shall be opened or closed upon both parties alike. If you enforce the act against the one, you must also enforce it as to the other. If you relax it as to one, so you must as to the other. Now, sir, I affirm there was nothing in the course of the last Administration towards the two powers of Mexico and Texas, contrary to the principle just stated. If the people of the United States choose to serve under the banner of Texas rather than that of Mexico, it is not chargeable to the Government. They act only in pursuance of a perfect right allowed them by the law of nations. Nations engaged in war have no right to impute to a third power the conduct of its citizens who take part in the war. Such a practice would multiply the causes of war, and be subversive of the peace of nations. It is not recognised by the custom of the enlightened nations of Europe. But as, between Mexico and Texas, the question occurs how far foreign nations may interfere, I shall admit it to be a sacred principle, that you are not allowed to intermeddle in the domestic quarrels of other States. The incipient stages of revolt, a popular commotion, or an insurrection, do not furnish proper or legitimate ground for interference.

When, however, the contest has reached the higher appellation of civil war, you are at liberty to take the justice of the cause into consideration, and join the party whom you may deem to have justice on its side. Such was the conduct of France in our struggle for independence. Such was the course of the allied sovereigns who arrested the march of the Ottoman in the Morea, and prevented him from grinding to the dust a people whose ancestors are renowned in history. The war between Mexico and Texas has been of a similar character. The latter are a people cradled in American liberty, once enjoying a federal system similar to our own, but resisting the overthrow of the Constitution and the march of a military chief to a throne. The struggle soon assumed the character of civil war. They were from thenceforth belligerants, governed by the laws of war. It was a right of this nation to have taken sides with Texas, had she seen proper to do so. By that act she might have abrogated the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with Mexico, but it would not have been a violation of the faith of treaties. The use of her liberty would only have deprived her of the rights of neutrality defined by the treaty. But this Government has not exercised its right to become party to a war from which it is not precluded by a treaty of neutrality. It has given no just offence to either of the parties, because it has been impartial between them. It has not arrested its citizens from a participation in the struggle; nor do the laws of nations require it. If the ultra-pacific policy contained in the act of 1818 has not been enforced, it is altogether a matter of domestic concern. If the Executive has relaxed its execution, it is for the American people to judge how far the nature of the contest required it, and is no just ground of complaint on the part of Mexico.

The SPEAKER reminded Mr. H. that a discussion upon that subject would not be in order.

Mr. HOLSEY would submit to the decision of the Chair, but he considered it impossible for him to repel the charges made against the Administration unless he drew a parallel between the two cases.

Mr. CUSHING had read the pamphlet in question, but would support the resolution because he desired to have it communicated officially to the House. With regard to its contents, he fully agreed with the views of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Howard.) Mr. C. commented at some length on the objectionable nature of the pamphlet, and the conduct of the diplomatic functionary who had communicated it to the Secretary. He would ask if it was a proper act for a foreign minister to adopt such a course, and to make the remarks attributed to him? That information, said Mr. C. has been communicated to the House by the Secretary of State, and, until it is contradicted by the same authority, I shall assume it to be correct. Was the course, therefore, of that Minister a justifiable and a proper one? A course, justly remarked by my colleague, calculated to engender bad feelings, and an incentive to hostility between this country and Mexico. Was it right for a Minister of a foreign power to make such remarks, leaving alone the communication of the pamphlet itself? I say it was grossly improper, and unless the name of that individual is made known, it will throw disgrace upon the whole diplomatic corps. Until that person shall be designated, a stigma of disgrace and reproach will cling to the whole of that body. I desire that the individual be made known, that we may put a mark upon him, in order that the rest of the diplomatic corps may be exonerated from the imputation which must otherwise rest upon them.

Mr. C. proceeded to state that it had been asserted in the public press, that the individual was no other than the British Minister. He did not pretend to say whether such was the fact or not; but he desired to know if such was the case, and whether that functionary, in the present delicate situation of Great Britain and the United States, had pursued such a course, calculated to inflame the differences between the United States and Mexico. If, however, the amendment should be carried, and the inquiry suppressed, he, Mr. C. would take it for granted, that it was the British Minister, and no one else. He would place that construction upon it, and he desired it might go forth to the world that, if the inquiry was refused, such was the verified and established fact.

Mr. C. was proceeding in his remarks, when—

The SPEAKER announced that the morning hour had expired, and the House then passed to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Executive communications, viz:

Mr. RENCHER moved a reconsideration of the vote by which this bill had been ordered to a third reading; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed to Friday next.

The engrossed bill for the relief of the executors of John H. Peterson, deceased, was amended, by striking out the provision for interest; and was then read a third time, and passed.

The following Message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private Secretary, Abraham Van Buren, esq.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress copies of a representation from a late grand jury of the county of Washington, in this District, concurred in by two of the judges of the Circuit Court, of the necessity for the erection of a new jail and a lunatic asylum in this city. I also transmit copies of certain proceedings of the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria, at the last October term, and of a representation of the grand jury, made with the approbation of the Court, showing the unsafe condition of the court-house of that county, and the necessity of a new one.

I recommend these objects to the favorable consideration of Congress.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, Jan. 13, 1838.

The Message having been read, was, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The following Message from the President of the United States, was also laid before the House:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 2d inst. I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of War, explanatory of the causes which have prevented a compliance with a resolution of that branch of Congress of February 24, 1837.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, Jan. 12, 1838.

[The resolution referred to in the above message was in relation to frauds committed upon the Creek Indians.]

On motion of Mr. OWENS referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OE REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, January 15, 1838.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the following subject was taken up:

Mr. PATTON of Virginia on Monday last presented the memorial of the Native American Association of Washington, signed by nearly one thousand persons, praying that Congress will pass an act repealing the acts now in force providing for the naturalization of foreigners, or so to modify them as may seem best calculated to secure to the native citizens of the United States the full enjoyment of the privileges and rights which they are justly entitled to under the Consitution. And also to make ample provisions by law for the protection of the United States from any future influx of foreign paupers and convicts.

Mr. PATTON moved to refer this memorial to a select committee.

Mr. HAYNES moved its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr LINCOLN of Massachusetts had moved the following instructions to that committee:

With instructions to consider the expediency of revising and so amending the laws on the subject of the naturalization of foreigners, as to require a term of longer residence in the United States previous to their admission to the rights of American citizenship, and greater checks and securities against frauds in the means and process of obtaining naturalization.

And further to consider the propriety and expediency of providing by law against the introduction into the United States of vagrants and paupers, deported from foreign countries, for whom no place of residence and means of employment, and certain support for a reasonable time after their arrival, have been previously prepared; and of requiring that the owners and masters of vessels by whom such persons shall be brought into the country shall be held liable for their relief, if left in distress, for —— months after their being landed.

Mr. LINCOLN now withdrew his instructions.

Mr. PATTON said it was a matter of indifference to him whether it was referred to a select committee, or the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAYNES was decidedly in favor of a reference to the Judiciary Committee. He considered the subject belonged properly and technically to that committee.

Mr. LINGOLN adverted, at some length, to the great importance of the naturalization laws, and contended that, owing to the great changes which had taken place within the last thirty-five years, it was necessary that considerable alterations should be made. He asked if gentlemen were aware of the immense evils which were inflicted on the Atlantic cities by the great influx of foreign paupers and convicts. He thought the subject ought to be referred to a select committee, consisting of gentlemen from that portion of the country who had seen and experienced the evil results of the present system.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. PAYNTER and BOON, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. HAYNES, and it was agreed to—yeas 97, noes not counted.

The bill making an additional appropriation for the removal of the great raft of Red river, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN,

The bill to amend the act in addition to the act for the funishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned, was taken up.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that it was proper he should give an explanation of the principal provisions of the bill now before the Senate, and he should perform this duty with as much brevity as possible. The committee on Foreign Relations (said Mr. B.) have carefully examined the act of the 20th April, 1818, which embodied all the former laws on the subject of our neutral relations, and have found that it is well adapted to enforce the observance of our duties towards belligerent nations. They, therefore, do not propose to make any material change in its provisions. Under that law, the citizens of the United States are not prohibited from carrying on any trade sanctioned by the law of nations; nor is it the purpose of this bill to abridge or interfere with any such lawful trade. The citizens of the United States have an unquestionable right to sell arms and munitions of war to the citizens or subjects of belligerent powers who come here to purchase them, without any violation of our neutral obligations. After this purchase has been made, the buyer must get these articles to the place of their destination as well as he can. If they are captured beyond the jurisdiction of this country, by the forces of his enemy, he sustains the loss; but that enemy has no right to ask our Government to prevent such sales. Again: any citizen of the United States may carry arms and munitions of war for sale to one belligerent nation without violating the neutrality of his country towards the other. Such a trade is not prohibited by the law of nations. It is true that such articles, if captured by the enemy on their passage, will be forfeited as contraband of war; but this is the only penalty imposed on such a trade by the law of nations. It is a question in which the Government of the neutral country has no concern. Our policy has ever been to promote the greatest freedom of commerce consistent with our neutral obligations. As regards our trade by sea with all foreign nations in arms and munitions of war, this bill makes no change. It will remain precisely as it was.

What, then, is the object of this bill? We have three neighbors on our frontiers, Canada, Texas and Mexico; and the duties of good neighborhood required something more from us in relation to them than could be strictly demanded under the law of nations. In Europe, reciprocal treaties between conterminous nations generally regulate this matter. In order to preserve peace along the frontiers, it is absolutely necessary that such regulations should exist. It is against all reason and justice, that in case of a sudden commotion in a neighboring country along our frontiers, the citizens of the United States should be permitted to take part with the insurgents, by furnishing them with vessels, arms, and munitions of war, for the express purpose of aiding and assisting in such hostilities. If this be tolerated, then it is in the power of the people along the borders of our country to force the whole nation into a war, whenever any number of dissatisfied individuals rise against the established Government of a neighboring State. It is our duty to prevent our citizens from aiding in every revolutionary movement against a neighboring Government. To prevent and to remedy such evils, is the sole object of the present bill. This bill inflicts no penalties whatever: it is a measure of prevention, not of punishment. The first section provides for the seizure of any vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, and of the arms and munitions of war which may be found therein, which is about to pass our frontier, when the circumstances of the case shall render it probable, that she is destined to be employed in carrying on hostilities against the citizens, subjects, or property of a conterminous friendly State or Territory, or in giving aid and comfort to the persons carrying on such hostilities, by conveying to their assistance men, arms, or munitions of war. The vessel and the arms thus seized are to be restored to the owner, as soon as he gives security that they shall not be employed in violating the provisions of the bill. In case he shall not give such security, they will be detained until the President orders them to be restored. It will strike every Senator at once, that such a provision is necessary to preserve the tranquillity of the country along the lakes and rivers which are the boundaries of our territory.

The second section makes a similar provision for the seizure and detention of arms and munitions of war belonging to a citizen of the United States, when the circumstances of the case render it probable that they are about to be carried across the frontier for the same hostile purposes.

Such provisions are not new to our law. The 10th and 11th sections of the act of April, 1818, afford a precedent for the first two sections of this bill. The owner of any vessel described in those sections, before it is permitted to leave the United States, is obliged to give security that it shall not be employed in carrying on hostilities against a friendly power.

Mr. B. said he deemed it unnecessary for the present to go further into the subject. He was prepared, however, to give any further explanation which any Senator might require. One observation he would make before he took his seat. In a New York paper which he received this morning, he had seen, with equal astonishment and regret, a letter from Col. M'Nabb, commanding a portion of her Britanic Majesty's forces in Canada, in which he not only avows that the outrage on the steamboat Caroline was commited by his orders, but he glories in the deed. He fancies that a Captain in the royal navy has acquired fresh laurels by becoming his agent in conducting this cowardly attack, upon our unarmed and unsuspecting citizens. If any thing were wanting to aggravate the enormity of this wanton outrage upon our territory and jurisdiction, it would be found in its open avowal of justification by a British officer, high in command. The British Government would have had an equal right to send one of their ships of war into the harbor of Boston or New York, to capture any American vessel at anchor there, which they suspected of hostile intentions against their country. The sovereignty and jurisdiction of the United States over our own territory has been grossly violated; and if any thing could prevent him from doing his duty in regard to this bill, it would be the indignant feelings which had been excited in his bosom by a perusal of this letter of Col. McNabb. But the wrong which we have suffered ought not to prevent us from doing justice. We were bound to perform our duties towards all nations; and we were imperatively bound to demand of the British Government to hold Colonel McNabb to a strict account for his conduct, and not to be satisfied without the most ample atonement.

He would now conclude by offering the three sections which he held in his hand as a substitute for the first three sections of the bill. The purpose of this amendment was to render the bill more specific, to confine its operation with greater precision to cases which might occur along our interior frontiers, and to expressly exclude any idea of interference with our trade by sea in arms and munitions of war.

Mr. RUGGLES hoped the Senator from Pennsylvania would not press the consideration of his amendment at the present time. He wished it printed, that he might have an opportunity to examine its provisions. He was not now prepared to say what effect the provisions of the bill would have upon the condition of things on our North-eastern border. He wished time to consider whether any and what modifications of the proposed amendment may be necessary to meet the case referred to. It is doubtless in the recollection of the committee, that a large portion of the territory of Maine is now, and has been for a number of years, in the possession of Great Britain. If troops or arms should be transported into that part of the territory of Maine by the Government of that State, for the purpose of taking possession of and defending it, would it be a violation of the provisions of the bill, and justify the President in ordering their apprehension and seizure? If this Government does not protect her jurisdictional rights, he trusted she would be left at liberty to defend her own soil. He saw no good reason for urging forward the action of the Senate on the bill under consideration, and hoped it would be postponed a day or two at least. He said it was understood that despatches had been recently received from the British Government, or are soon expected. They might perhaps contain something from that Government relating to the subject of the boundary. If satisfactory, very well. If the matter is left where it has been for the last eight or ten years, it will be time to consider whether our relations with that Government require the passage of this bill, or what modifications it ought to receive. He presumed the Senator would consent to a postponement of the matter for the present.

Mr. BUCHANAN had no disposition to hurry this bill; at the same time, if it were to pass at all, it would be well if it passed speedily. The amendment he had proposed to this bill did not vary its several principles in any respect; but it confined their operation, in express terms, to the foreign States and colonies conterminous with the United States. The committee thought that the bill required this amendment; otherwise it might possibly interfere with the general law which regulated our trade with foreign nations. If the Senator (Mr. Ruggles) had any amendment to offer in reference to Maine, it would be as well to consider it now as at any other time. The committee, Mr. B. said, had charged him with the duty of bringing forward this bill at the earliest period, and it was his fault, perhaps, that it had been delayed till the abolition question was determined. If, however, the gentleman wished a postponement till to-morrow, he had no objection to grant it.

Mr. RUGGLES said he did not wish to be understood by that Senator, nor by the Senate, as having any disposition to throw unreasonable embarrassments in the way of the progress of the bill, although he must say that he should feel much less anxiety for its passage on account of the circumstance the Senator from Pennsylvania had mentioned. He alluded to the information we have received this morning, that the gross and flagrant outrage on the Niagara frontier, (he referred to the attack upon, and destruction of the Caroline,) was avowed by the commanding officer in that vicinity as having been committed by his direction. He was satisfied with the proposition to adopt the amendment as matter of form, and to have it printed for further consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN considered that it would be very unfortunate, indeed, if the important question of the Maine boundary should be mixed up with the matters contained in this bill. That question would of itself be sufficient to command the anxious and undivided attention of Congress when it should be properly presented. At present, he understood from high authority, that an answer was daily expected at the Department of State, from the British Government, to the last proposition made by this Government. For aught he knew, it might, at this very time, have been actually received. The negotiation was about to close; and, at this moment, to take the question out of the hands of the Executive, and introduce it into a bill to preserve the peace of our frontiers, would, in his opinion, be exceedingly ill-timed.

The amendment, Mr. B. said, did no more than to define, with greater precision, the objects to which the bill was intended to apply. He trusted, therefore, that the Senator from Maine would permit the question to be taken upon this amendment. After its adoption, he would move to postpone the bill, and make it the special order of the day for to-morrow, and to print the amendment.

The amendments were then agreed to, and the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The bill for the relief of certain persons therein named, was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and after considerable discussion was amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the steamboat company of Nantucket, was amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, January 16, 1838.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The first business in order was the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, on the case of the Mississippi election, which had been postponed to this day.

The subject having been announced from the CHAIR,

Mr. BRONSON rose and intimated his wish to offer a resolution.

Mr. WISE inquired if it would be in order.

The CHAIR replied not, unless it related to the subject matter under consideration.

Mr. BRONSON saying that it did, the resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That S. S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to seats in this House.

Mr. WISE moved the preliminary motion that the gentlemen referred to have leave to appear within the bar of the House, touching their right to seats therein, as representatives from the State of Mississippi.

Mr. W. at first modified his resolution, by substituting for the words "have leave," the words "are entitled," but subsequently retained the original words, at the suggestion, he said, of several gentlemen near him. At the same time, he added, he took that opportunity of saying that, by the term "have leave," these gentlemen did not waive the position they had assumed before that House, the Government and the nation, and that that House had not the power to deny the State of Mississippi the right of representation upon that floor. Mr. W. retained the expression only because it was the customary form of words.

Mr. HOWARD, after alluding to the indisposition of Mr. CLAIBORNE, stated that he had in his possession a paper from that gentleman, containing a statement in relation to the subject before the House, which he desired might be read by the Clerk, and afterwards printed.

Mr. BELL objected.

Mr. WISE had no objection to the printing of the paper, but could not consent to its reading, which would interfere with the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD observed that as the statement on the other side had been printed and laid upon the tables of members, it was no more than fair that the paper of Mr. CLAIBORNE should be laid before the House as early as possible.

Mr. BELL referred to the case of Arnold of Tennessee, and proposed to amend the resolution so as to make it conform to the precedent established in that case, as follows:

Resolved, That S. S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word have leave to occupy seats within the bar of this House pending the discussion of the report of the Committee of Elections upon their application; and that they have leave to speak to the merits of their application, and the report of the committee thereon.

Mr. WISE accepted the modification.

Mr. FOSTER objected to the words "within the bar." He considered the resolution ought to be worded so as to preclude any debate on the part of the claimants after they had closed their argument. He did not think it right that they should be permitted to mingle in debate with members of the House after making their arguments on the question they were interested in. With that view, he moved to amend the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That S. S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word have leave to appear at the bar of this House, and argue on the merits of their application for seats therein.

Mr. BELL hoped the gentleman from New York would not make any technical objections to the resolution, which was worded in strict conformity with established precedent.

Mr. FOSTER made some brief remarks in support of his amendment. He contended that the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Bell) had selected a single isolated case, and that all the other precedents would be found against him.

Mr. WISE regretted that any opposition of that nature should have been made to the resolution. It was a matter of no consequence to him where the claimants were heard, whether "within" the bar, or "at" the bar, so that they were heard. Mr. W. alluded to the high respectability of the gentlemen, and hoped that the House would treat them in a manner worthy of the station they occupied, as representatives sent by the people of Mississippi.

Mr. POPE objected to the word "bar" being introduced at all into the resolution. To him it gave the matter the appearance of a trial in a court of justice, and was derogatory to the highly respectable gentlemen claiming their seats. He wished the word to be struck out altogether.

Mr. WISE suggested to Mr. P. that the word "bar" had its parliamentary sense, as well as the sense when applied to a court of justice. In the present case it had a general meaning, and signified "the House."

Mr. BELL protested against the amendment of the gentleman from New York, inasmuch as it appeared to him an attempt to narrow down into the least possible compass the privileges which might be allowed to the claimants. He would ask the gentleman what there was in the present case which required such extraordinary rigor? Was it not conducted in strict conformity with the former practice of the House? Mr. B. contended that the present case was not an ordinary case of a contested election. It was a distinctive election by the people of Mississippi, not at all connected with the preceding one. If the matter were at the option of the gentlemen, he admitted it would be a different affair, but such was not the case; they came as representatives from the people of Mississippi, and could not recede. All that was asked, was the same privileges might be granted to them, as were granted in the cases of Arnold and Newland.

Mr. GLASCOCK regretted there should be any unnecessary discussion on the subject. He saw no benefit to be derived from the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, because, if either proposition were adopted the claimants would have the privilege of being heard, which was all that was desired. It was of no importance whether they were within the bar or at the bar, as the object contemplated would be accomplished. The amendment was a mere technical objection, and of no consequence whatever. The claimants were gentlemen of high standing, and he had no doubt that they would be treated with proper courtesy by the House, and that the question would be decided in conformity with the Constitution, at the same time with due deference to the laws of Mississippi.

Mr. HAMER saw no manner of use in the proposed amendment, as whether it were adopted or not, the result would be the same. In his opinion the original resolution was amply sufficient.

Mr. REED hoped that whether the amendment was adopted or not, the gentlemen from Mississippi would be treated with proper courtesy, and allowed the same privileges as in former cases of the same nature.

Mr. CUSHING was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. HAYNES saw no benefit which would arise from the adoption of the amendment, as whether the claimants were said to be "within" the bar, or "at" the bar, it would amount to the same thing.

After some remarks from Mr. BIDDLE, in opposition to the amendment,

Mr. FOSTER assured the House that he had no objection to the situation occupied by the claimants. His only object in offering the amendment was to provide, that after the claimants had closed their argument, they should not then be allowed to mingle in debate with members of the House. If the original resolution would accomplish that object, he had no objection to withdraw his amendment; but as the resolution made no such provision, he would still press his modification.

Mr. BOON moved the previous question, which was ordered—ayes 85, noes not counted.

The main question was then ordered without a count, and Mr. BELL'S resolution agreed to without a division.

The SPEAKER then directed the officers of the House to provide seats for Messrs. Prentiss and Word, which were placed for them in the centre aisle, and those gentlemen having taken their seats, the Speaker communicated to them the order of the House, and informed them that they were at liberty to address the House in relation to their application.

Mr. HOWARD then renewed his application to present a paper prepared by the Hon. Mr. CLAIBORNE, one of the sitting members, who was confined to his bed from a severe attack of illness.

Mr. BELL objected; but if the one statement should be read, he should move to have the statement of the applying members read also. However, he wished the House to determine, in the first place, when they would take up this question with a view to decide it. Mr. B. had prepared a resolution for the purpose.

Mr. WISE made a brief statement in relation to the paper of the claimants, laid on the tables of the members yesterday, which produced a reply from Mr. GHOLSON, and some remarks of a most painfully personal character passed between them.

The CHAIR interposed, and both gentlemen having taken their seats, the question on reading Mr. CLAIBORNE'S statement was propounded to the House, and assented to. It was then read as follows:

MR. CLAIBORNE'S ARGUMENT.

A severe illness, which confines me to my room, will prevent my taking part, personally, in the discussion of the questions in which I am interested, growing out of the recent elections in the State of Mississippi. I feel it to be proper and necessary, therefore, to communicate, in writing, those views which, were I able, I should, at a fitting time, express on the floor of the House of Representatives. This course seems to be the more requisite, inasmuch as my collegue, who has a joint interest with me in the subject, is also confined to his room by indisposition.

I am fully aware of the kindness and ability of the friends who, in my absence, will maintain my rights; and perhaps I may only weaken the effect of their exertions in my behalf, by what I may now say. I believe, too, that no unfair advantage of my absence would by taken by any one member of the House. But it is right that the views entertained by me should be expressed, in justice to myself; so that, whatever may be the result, there may remain some evidence that I supported, to the best of my ability, what I conceive to be the cause of those whose votes entitled me to a seat upon the floor; and that there may be no ground for saying hereafter, that, from overweening confidence, or carelessness, or doubt, I did not avail myself of the best opportunity of doing so that circumstances afforded. I am fully persuaded, too, that the gentlemen who claim the seats of my colleague and myself, would themselves prefer that we should adopt this mode of presenting our views to the House; so that their success, were they to succeed even, might not, in any degree, be attributable to our absence or our silence.

At the special session in September last, the House, after full investigation, decided that my colleague and myself were entitled to our seats for the entire term of the 25th Congress. The question then settled was one of law, arising out of the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Mississippi. The only facts involved were the proclamation of the Governor of that State, and the consequent election, by a majority of votes, of my colleague and myself; facts which no one then or since has pretended to deny, and the evidence of which was before the Committee of Elections, and afterwards before the House. Although we were the only persons claiming seats as members elect from Mississippi, the decision made in our case cannot be termed an ex parte one. An ex parte decision is one in which the facts on one side only are exhibited; or, all the facts being exhibited, the argument on one side only is heard. In the case of my colleague and myself, our right to qualify was denied and put in issue, when we presented ourselves for that purpose, before the House was organized. The affirmative and negative of the proposition were distinctly made out, and their respective supporters in the House were arrayed against each other. My colleague and myself were, in fact, placed, by the course that was pursued, upon the defensive; and in the prolonged debate to which the subject gave rise, the talent, industry, perseverance, and warmth manifested on both sides, left nothing unsaid which, by way of argument or illustration, could be brought to bear upon the questions involved in the discussion. Neither for want of facts nor of argument, therefore, can the decision of the House, in September last, in the matter of the Mississippi election, be called an ex parte one; but it must be considered as a grave and solemn adjudication deliberately made by the competent and only authority.

The question that now presents itself is, Shall the decision, thus made, be reviewed, to the end that it may be reversed; because, differing in opinion from a majority of the House of Representatives, the Governor of Mississippi, pursuing the literal tenor of a law of that State, has ordered a new election to fill a supposed vacancy in its representation, after the House of Representatives, the only constitutional judge in the matter, had determined that no such vacancy existed? Had the new election not been ordered, or had the present claimants not appeared, it is not for a moment to be supposed that the House of Representatives, of its own motion, would have reversed its decision in favor of my colleague and myself, at this or at any other time. Is there any thing in the facts which requires it to do so now? Has any new fact, necessary to a correct decision, been brought a light, which was not before the Committee of Elections and the House in September last?

I have heard it suggested that, in September, the credentials of my colleague and myself were not before the committee. Now, it is well known that the credentials of a member elect are rarely, if ever, demanded, when he presents himself to qualify; and, that, perhaps, not one-half of the members have their credentials in their possession. All that is necessary is satisfactory evidence of the election of the individual. The law points out no particular mode in which this is to be given. The House, which, by the Constitution, is "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members," is the judge, necessarily, of the evidence of their election, or, in other words, their credentials; and cases have occurred in which the House, not satisfied with the evidence of election presented, has taken testimony to show that the party presenting it has received illegal votes; and therefore, although holding the ordinary credentials, was not entitled to his seat. The credentials of the ordinary form are, therefore, of themselves, of no binding authority; and if the exhibition of them would not estop an examination into our title to our seats, the want of them, if the House were satisfied of our election by other means, could not defeat our title: this is evident. The evidence of our right to our seats, presented in September last, was a statement from the Secretary of State of Mississippi, under the great seal of office, of the votes cast in the then recent (July) election. The ordinary certificate of election, or credentials, were forwarded to my colleague, but never received by him. Those sent to me were received; but, perceiving that they contained the limitation of the term of service mentioned in the Governor's writ to hold the election, we applied for, and obtained, the statement from the Secretary of State to be used in their stead. All this was distinctly stated by us to the Committee of Elections in September last. Now the only matter which appeared in the credentials, besides the election of my colleague and myself, was, that we were elected for the special session only. This is all that is pretended. Had this appeared in the credentials only—had we, by not presenting the credentials, withheld the only evidence of this matter, there would be some ground for the suggestion now made, that the credentials, not having been before the committee or the House, all the facts were not presented; and that the case, at this time, should be re-opened to let in a new fact. But is this so? Why, what was the question that so long occupied the attention of the House in September? Did it not grow out of the very fact, now pretended to be a new one, that the Governor's writ was for an election for the special session only? Was not the only question before the House, the question whether we were elected for the special session, or for the whole term of the Congress? And is it not strange that it should be contended now, that the House was without evidence of the fact, the existence of which—the uncontroverted truth of which—was the sole cause of all the protracted and excited debate to which the Mississippi election of July gave rise? The fact that we received a majority of the votes then cast, was undeniable. The fact that those votes were given at an election held under a writ ordering one for a less period than the entire Congress, was also undeniable; and out of this fact grew the only discussion that took place.

It has also been suggested that the official proclamation of the Secretary of State of Mississippi, summing up the whole number of votes given, was not presented by my colleague or myself to the committee in September last. Such proclamation was never given to us; but if it had been, and we had presented it, it would have only amounted to proof, in a different form, of that of which other proof had already satisfied the committee, and which was not then, nor has it since been, denied—our election by a majority of the votes cast under a writ ordering an election for a less period than the whole term of the Twenty-fifth Congress.

I have thus shown that there were no facts existing at the time the House decided the rights of my colleague and myself to our seats, which were not then known to the House; and that the matter now suggested as new, so far from being so, is the very matter that gave rise to the discussions of September. The fact is independent of the form in which it is presented: and, whether the House was informed that the election at which we were chosen representatives was held for a shorter term than the whole Congress, by the production of the Governor's writ, the proclamation of the Secretary of State, the exhibition of credentials in the ordinary form, or universal admission of the fact, is immaterial, if the House was in the possession of the fact when it came to its decision.

It has been said, however, that during the debate upon the resolution declaring us to be duly elected to the twenty-fifth Congress, parol proofs or statements were made to the House in relation to the election in July, strongly calculated to influence the judgment of the House.

During the discussions in September last, my colleague and myself remained silent from motive of delicacy, except on one occasion, when, in reply to a member from Ohio, (Mr. Mason,) who, as we supposed, had misstated our course and position, we declared, what we still believe, that those who voted for us did so under the impression that we would hold our seats during the entire twenty-fifth Congress. We also stated in an argument submitted by us to the Committee of Elections, "that the election in July was conducted with great zeal and ardor, which was entirely inconsistent with the supposition that the people were misled, by the notion of the Governor into the belief that they were only conferring a temporary appointment for two months, to be superseded by members then to be chosen by a new election for the residue of the vacancy. So far, too, as the press may be considered indicative of public sentiment, it may be safely stated that, prior to the election, both parties assumed the ground that the Governor had the power to issue the writ; that he had no authority to abridge the constitutional congressional term; and that the members to be elected would serve during the whole twenty-fifth Congress." In addition to this, the honorable Hugh S. Legare, of South Carolina, in his argument, read an article written by a distinguished editor in Mississippi, (Mann Butler, Esq.) friendly to the election of one of the present claimants, (Mr. Prentiss,) reiterating what he had asserted when the Governor issued his writ—that the members elect would serve through the entire Congress, the Executive having no power to abridge the constitutional term.

The statements made by my colleague and myself, by the argument submitted to the committee, and by Mr. Legare in his speech to the House, were to be found in the newspapers of the day, which spoke for themselves. What weight they may have had on the House is not known; but it certainly could not have affected the decision of the legal question, upon which alone our right to our seats depended. That question arose upon facts with which those here stated had nothing to do.

Has any thing occurred since the decision of the House in September, which can justify a review of that decision? That the Governor of Mississippi, still satisfied of the correctness of the opinions entertained by him when he ordered the special election, and pursuing the literal tenor of the law of the State, should have ordered the late election, was to have been anticipated. The decision of the House of Representatives, however, did not require his conforming to it to make it binding. Ought the fact that, at the late election, others than my colleague and myself were chosen, to have any influence upon the present action of the House? The House, in confirming the election held in July last, decided in anticipation that an election (the late one) held in November would be a nullity. As it cannot have any influence, therefore, as a legal and competent act, any weight that it may have with members, must proceed from the belief that it exhibits the wishes of a majority of the voters of Mississippi, and is entitled to such consideration as would justify the House of Representatives in reviewing, and, if it pleases, reversing, the decision that has already taken place.

The doctrine that an election, legal in itself, may be set aside, and a member duly qualified deprived of his seat, because, after his election, a majority of his constituents become dissatisfied with him, and elect, at their own time and place, another, is indeed a novel one. The right of the people to instruct their representatives, and the duty of the representatives to obey such instructions or resign their seats, has long been admitted; but it is yet to be maintained, that the House may vacate the seat of a member because such instructions were disobeyed. Were the seats of members dependent during their terms upon the fluctuations of public opinion after their election, the tenure would be indeed uncertain. And yet the argument that would give weight to the recent election in Mississippi, merely because it was supposed to be indicative of the present opinions and wishes of the people, would, if carried out, lead to such conclusions. The fact that such election was made according to the tenor of an existing law makes no difference If the object of the election is illegal, it matters little whether it is authorized to be held by the Legislature or the Governor, or is the act of the people in their primary assemblies.

I have thus attempted to show, that the decision of the House of Representatives on the rights of my colleague and myself, in September last, was not an ex parte one; that it was made upon a full knowledge of the facts necessary to a just judgment; and that nothing has occurred since, which can impair its force or weaken its binding character.

I contend, therefore, that the decision in question is final and conclusive, and a bar to all further proceedings. I am well aware that the terms thus used by me are as strong as I could employ, and, in their strict sense, might imply than any further action of the House would be inoperative. Such, however, is not the extent of my meaning. In the case of a right vested in an individual, under an act of the Legislature, creating a contract between the individual and the State, a court of justice will interfere to protect him from any further legislation impairing or taking away his rights. There is a power in such case to restrain the action of the Legislature within the limits of the Constitution. In the present case, the Constitution makes the House of Representatives the supreme and only judge. The rights of the member, awarded to him by the House, may, so far as feeling, reputation, and honor are concerned, be far more valuable and important to him than any pecuniary interests that can grow up under a contract between the State and an individual; but, while the latter is protected by a paramount authority, the protection of the former is to be found only in the will of the Legislature; and, should this be capricious, variable, or uncertain, the individual experiences in his most valued political rights all those wrongs against which his rights to his property were effectually guarded, when the Constitution made it the duty of the courts of justice to protect them. It is the very absence of any power to restrain the action of the House of Representatives, in cases like the present—it is the very fact that its will is the law—that the rights which it gives to-day it may take away to-morrow—that make consistency in its decisions so paramount a duty. When I speak, therefore, of the binding character of the decision of the House in September last, and urge that decision as a bar to the pretensions of the present claimants, I rely upon the sense of its own dignity, its appreciation of its own duties, even where its will is unrestricted, to make the action of the House as consistent in regard to the political rights of its members, as if those rights, like the vested rights of individuals, were under the protection of the courts of justice.

Had the investigation which took place in September been imperfect, owing to any concealment on the part of my colleague or myself—had we suppressed facts or made misstatements—there would be an equitable reason for the review of the decision then made. Such was not the case, however; and, considering that decision as final and conclusive, I have not gone, nor shall I go, into any argument to show that it was correct. The questions of law involved in it were fully and ably examined; and I contend that, so far as my colleague and myself are concerned, they were conclusively settled.

The case of my colleague and myself does not address itself alone to the House as a mere legal question. It has the strongest equities on its side, growing out of the action of the House itself. The election in Mississippi was held in July, and we were in Washington on the first day of the special session. On that day, and before the House of Representatives was organized, our right to our seats was disputed; and one of the first acts of the House, after its organization, was to refer our case to the Committee of Elections. This committee reported a resolution declaring us to be duly elected, and entitled to our seats. The report was presented on the 25th September, and was finally acted upon by the House on October 3d. In the mean while, we were urging a decision by all the means in our power; stating our wish and determination, if not confirmed in our seats, to hasten back to Mississippi, to renew the canvass there before the election in November. At length, when the decision of the House was made, what was our situation? We were 1,500 miles from home. We could not accomplish the journey in less than twenty days, which would have left us about fourteen days in which to canvass the fifty-six counties of the State; counties, too, which had been but recently canvassed by one at least of the present claimants, at his leisure, without opposition and with every advantage. Had we, therefore, been inclined to return, after the decision of the House, it would not have been possible to notify all our friends of our arrival among them, before they would have been called upon to vote. Willing, as we might have been, to submit our pretensions a second time to the people, the course pursued by the House would have prevented us from doing so; and had the decision been against us, there would have been found more than one to say, that our defeat in Mississippi, had we been defeated at the November election, was more to be attributed to the tardy action of the House, than to the fair expression of the will of our constituents. Had the decision of the House been immediate, upon the objection being made to our qualifying in September, justice would have been done to us. The delay of the journey to and from Washington would have furnished no cause of complaint; for we made it at our own risk, knowing the circumstances of our election. But the decision was postponed; and the time lost here, awaiting the action of the House, was more than sufficient to enable us to conduct the canvass at home, with the certainty of succeeding.

Not only, therefore, have we the claim upon the House growing out of its decision in our favor, but the strong equity, addressed to its moral sense, growing out of the circumstances, just stated, under which that decision was made; and we have these claims in the absence, too, of any thing going to show that, at the time of the decision, the House was not in the full possession of all the necessary facts, and assisted by all the light which the arguments of talent, learning, and industry, actively employed on both sides of the question, could afford.

I have thus stated my views, supposing, for the sake of argument, that the recent election in Mississippi is indicative of the opinions of a majority of the voters. This, however, I by no means believe to be the case. My colleague and myself were absent from the State. In some of the counties all our friends voted; in many others, they did not. The decision of the House had been so recently made, that there was hardly time to circulate it; and although I believe the canvass to have been conducted in all fairness by the present claimants, still it is not pretended that the strength of the friends of my colleague and myself was at all tested. I have prepared a statement of the votes cast at the late election, and have accompanied it with such remarks as must, I think, show, that the November election furnishes no reason for believing, that my colleage and myself would not have been re-elected even then, had an opportunity been afforded us of appearing before the people, and procuring unity of action among our friends. This statement is hereto annexed.

In conclusion, I repeat that I consider this whole case settled and concluded, by virtue of the judgment of the House; a judgment founded upon a full knowledge of the law and the facts; a judgment that prevented us from entering upon a canvass that subsequently took place, and restrained a majority of our friends from the exercise, on this occasion, of their elective franchise; a judgment which the House had the express constitutional power to pronounce, and which, once pronounced, cannot be reviewed or reversed, without injustice to the parties, and disparagement to its own dignity.

The highest vote for Congress - -	19,909
Difference	7,793
Mr. Prentiss's vote falls short of a majority of the votes cast for Governor, by	200

It is contended by me that the entire opposition vote was thrown for Mr. Prentiss, and probably more; because his vote far exceeds that of any other Whig candidate, Mr. Word not excepted. It is also contended, that the excess of votes given for Governor, over the highest vote given for Congress, consisted of Democratic votes, withheld by the voters in consequence of the decision of the House, which they supposed entitled us to our seats.

Therefore, take the vote given for Claiborne in November, say - - -	6,258
Add the excess of votes for Governor above the votes for Congress - -	7,793
Makes - - -	14,051
This exceeds Mr. Prentiss's vote -	400

Add excess of votes for Governor above votes for Congress - - -	7,793
Makes - - -	13,825
This exceeds Mr. Prentiss's vote -	174

Other comparisons might be instituted, showing that, had there been a full election, without reference to the decision of the House, there would, in all probability, have been a decided majority for my colleague and myself.

It is proper to state that one of the persons mentioned in the preceding calculations, Mr. Grimball, originally stood as the opposition candidate for Governor, and in some of the counties received the partial vote of that party, but in the counties enumerated he was run as a Democratic candidate; he was defended by the Democratic journals; and we feel authorized to state it as his own opinion, that the votes he there received were taken from Mr. McNutt.

The reading being concluded—

Mr. BELL sent to the Chair the following special order; which was read.

Resolved, That the question arising upon the report of the Committee of Elections be made the special order of the day for this day, and on each succeeding day, until the same shall be decided.

Mr. B. said he was authorized to say, that if it was expected Mr. CLAIBORNE could attend in any reasonable time, he should meet the wishes of the claimants by postponing it to a further day.

Mr. GHOLSON stated that both his honorable colleague and himself were anxious for the adoption of this order, for they desired no delay, and had no wish to address the House themselves.

Mr. BELL had understood so, and he accordingly moved his resolution.

Mr. CAMBRELENG should not oppose the motion, but he merely took that opportunity to state that the public service was very much in need of the passage of some of the appropriation bills, and if this order were not adopted, he should move to take up some of those bills.

Mr. PATTON suggested a modification to restrict it from and after one o'clock each day, which Mr. BELL accepted.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, inquired if the gentleman from Tennessee intended to embrace the days set apart for the consideration of private business in his order.

Mr. BELL was sorry to inform the gentleman that he did, for taking them and Mondays which were set apart for the reception of petitions, the public had only three days out of the seven remaining.

The motion of Mr. BELL was then agreed to.

The question then recurred upon Mr. BRONSON'S resolution above, declaring that Messrs. Prentiss and Word were not members of the present Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then moved the printing of Mr. CLAIBORNE'S paper, and also the statement of the other gentlemen.

Objection being made, on motion of Mr. HOWARD, the rules were suspended.

Mr. HOWARD said he felt it due to Mr. CLAIBORNE to say that the paper would have been printed and laid on the tables of the members, if time had permitted it; but the statement to which it was a reply was only sent in yesterday, and the answer could not be prepared and printed in so short a time.

The motion to print was opposed by Messrs. PATTON, GRAVES, and JENIFER, and supported by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, CILLEY, and PENNYBACKER, when Mr. UNDERWOOD withdrew the motion, and Mr. CILLEY renewed it, and it was then agreed to.

So the paper of Mr. CLAIBORNE was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWSON then rose and said he had waited to hear a proposition in relation to what had occurred between honorable members of that body this morning, from some older member; but such not being the case, he felt it his duty, as a member of the House of Representatives, to propose some order to prevent the recurrence of such scenes. He had, therefore, drafted a resolution according to what parliamentary usage required in such cases. It was as follows:

"The Hon. SAMUEL GHOLSON, a member of this House from the State of Mississippi, and the Hon. HENRY A. WISE, also a member, from the State of Virginia, having spoken language subject to the censure of this House, be it therefore

"Resolved, That those gentlemen do now make submission to this body."

Mr. WISE and Mr. GHOLSON then made mutual statements, each apologising to the House as a body, without withdrawing any of the offensive language used towards each other.

Mr. GLASCOCK, feeling satisfied that such a resolution would but serve to excite, instead of to allay, the feelings of the parties, with great respect for the mover, moved to lay the same on the table.

At the request of Mr. MERCER, who promised to renew it, Mr. GLASCOCK withdrew the motion, and the former gentleman raised the point whether the resolution was in order; but the CHAIR ruling it to be in order, Mr. M. renewed Mr. G's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. MERCER then moved the following:

Resolved, That Messrs. GHOLSON and WISE, members of this House, between whom warm words have passed in debate, be required by the SPEAKER to declare in their places, that they will not prosecute further the quarrel which has arisen this day between them.

Mr. JENIFER moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. MERCER asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were yeas 78, nays 123.

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. HOWARD, POPE, JENIFER, TURNEY, MERCER and GLASCOCK.

Mr. GLASCOCK moved the indefinite postponement of the resolution.

The merits of the resolution were then further discussed by Messrs. CUSHING and REED, when, without coming to any decision,

On motion of Mr. JENIFER,

The House adjourned.

VERMONT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. SWIFT said he had given notice of his intention at a future day to present the report and resolutions of the State of Vermont, which had been offered on a former occasion, but withdrawn. His intention was not to bring them before the Senate until the discussion on the resolutions introduced by the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) had been finished. As that discussion was presumed to be terminated, he would now introduce them. He would offer no other apology for presenting them now, than the duty he owed to his State. The resolutions spoke for themselves; nor did Vermont require him to vindicate them on that floor. He expressed his regret, however, that they should have been so harshly assailed as they had been. Not only the sentiments contained in them, but the motives of those who adopted them, had been subjects of unjust censure and reproach. What principles were asserted that should call forth the invectives that had fallen from gentlemen on the opposite side of the house? It was contended that Congress had the power, and it was respectfully asked to exercise that power, in abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, over which it was presumed to have exclusive control. Could any just exception be taken to that? Nothing has been hinted by the Legislature of Vermont, that Congress ought to interfere with slavery in the States. Such an opinion was nowhere breathed in the document before them. One of the resolutions in question had not passed the Legislature, but received the sanction of the popular branch only, that might have asserted doctrines offensive to the South. It was not Vermont only that was opposed to the extension of slavery, but it was the general feeling throughout the Northern States. The annexation of Texas, which was looked to by the South to give it predonderance over the North, was presumed by many to involve principles of high national importance. And should not a State be permitted to present a memorial in relation to subjects which so vitally concerned the whole? It is contended by many, that the grant to Congress to regulate commerce implies the right to suppress the slave trade in the States.

A Senator from North Carolina had been pleased to say that Vermont had disgraced herself by the adoption of those resolutions. He (Mr. S.) was willing to leave others to judge whether the doctrines of humanity and justice were more degrading than those of an opposite character. Another Senator, from Alabama, had pronounced them an infamous libel on the people of the South. He would undertake to say that every fact contained in that report was drawn from the newspaper statements of the day, of outrages upon individual rights that had remained unpunished, and these were solemnly believed at least. It could not be denied that evils did grow out of a state of slavery, and the people of the South had set forth, in glowing colors, the same thing. If the people of Vermont believe so, shall they not be permitted to give, in a full and open manner, their reasons for doing so? With regard to the epithets which had been thrown out, they were estimated for what they were intrinsically worth, and could have no effect in changing Vermont. That State was not to be driven from the right to express her opinions, either by menace or invective. The declarations that had been made were not magnanimous, and he hoped to hear less of them. He could tell gentlemen they would do no good, and might do much harm. In presenting the document before them, he was doing merely his duty to his constituents.

Mr. PRESTON addressed the Senate for some time in reply. He presumed the document would not have been presented, unless under authority of command, in obedience to higher powers, where the servant could exercise no discretion. Coming from a sovereign State, we were, he presumed, bound to treat it with respect and deference. This subject ought to be managed with great caution. Vermont certainly had the right to come here, and her memorials were entitled to reception and consideration. But the question was whether we were to respect that Government more than this Government. Respect was certainly mutual and co-relative. He was disposed to speak with great forbearance on the subject. Here was a report wantonly presented, characterized by language which, if used by any individual or Senator of this body, would be rejected with disdain. In it the South is charged with immorality and irreligion; and when, with becoming dignity, we repel the charge, we are "uncourteous" and "offensive" in our language. Yes, sir, (said Mr. P.) at the very moment of presenting to this body a document, in language so justly characterized by the Senator from Alabama as false, scandalous and libelous—at the very moment of presenting a document deliberately concocted by order of the Vermont Legislature, the member presenting it complains of the indignant retort of those whose feelings are outraged and insulted by it. While we are stigmatized as debauched, sensual, immoral, sinful, God-offending creatures, and when we speak of fanatics and incendiaries, we are rebuked and chidden. Was this fair? was it proper? So long and so tamely had the South borne all this, that when a proper reply was made, she was greeted as the assailant; and if she bore it much longer, Mr. P. would agree that she was all she had been represented. Here was one wide-spread denunciation of the people of the South, in which wives and children all were included—to what extent was their patience to be tried? Was this motion to be treated with more respect because it came from a sovereign State? Did legislative scandal sanction it? A subject indecorous in itself could not be made less so, because it emanated from a sovereign State. When did the South, in the bitterest time of high tariff memory, ever present such a memorial as that against the North? He told gentlemen they were mistaken in relation to the South; their laws were supreme, and they were more secure from mobs, or popular outbreakings, than the people of the North. More blood had been shed out of the South by mobs than in it by mobs and slaves put together. If he was disposed to retort, he might point to Vermont at this time, where the law was trodden under foot by the turbulence of some of her citizens. He might, if he were so disposed, point to the single distinguished city of Boston, where more lives had been lost, and property of unoffending females sacrificed, than in the whole South; but he would not choose to do so. He maintained that the people of the South were more law binding than any people on the face of the earth. A constable with his staff would do as much towards preserving peace any where south of the Potomac as an army with banners.

Mr. PRENTISS made some further remarks in reply. He was not prepared to say there was quite as much fervor in the Legislature of Vermont as was expressed in the resolutions. He disclaimed, however on the part of the report, any disposition to interfere with the interests of the South, or any desire to compromise her dignity. As far as he was concerned, he had been careful to make no improper or exciting remarks; he had not only a high respect for the people of the South; but respect their feelings in relation to these questions. Mr. P. however, did not like to hear the people of Vermont branded as fanatics and incendiaries, because they chose to assert the constitutional power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. Mr. P. read from an old pamphlet some strictures, to show that the people of this District had, on a former occasion, expressed themselves as adverse to slavery.

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that the Senator from Vermont had alluded in the course of his remarks, in connection with the fifth resolution, to the manner in which it had been adopted. The Senator stated that this resolution did not pass both branches of his Legislature, but was only passed by the popular branch. Do I understand the Senator correctly, asked Mr. C. in stating this?

Mr. SWIFT made a few explanatory remarks.

Mr. CUTHBERT believed that he understood the operation by which these resolutions had been passed in the Vermont Legislature. This resolution proceeded from a joint committee of both branches of the Legislature. That joint committee reported to each House, and were acted upon not jointly, but severally. It comes to us, therefore, continued Mr. C. under the sanction of the one House acting under the authority of both Houses, and therefore comes to us just as any other resolution does.

Mr. PRENTISS said he had no other feeling in this matter than a desire to discharge his duty to his Legislature. He must be allowed, however, to express his regret at the course pursued when these resolutions were before the Senate at a prior period. The remarks indulged in at the time, were, in his opinion, more calculated to augment than to allay excitement. The resolutions were offered with no other view than to be laid on the table and printed, and yet this simple request had been met with objections of a very uncourteous character. By whom had this been opposed? By those who held that this was a confederate compact. How could gentlemen in favor of State rights refuse, on any just principle, to receive and print a document emanating from such a source? He (Mr. P.) deeply regretted the course pursued, because he considered it disrespectful to the State of Vermont, and her inhabitants, than whom a more virtuous, intellectual, moral, and exemplary people, was no where to be found; and were such a people not to be allowed to present their views on subjects of high national import, without incurring reproach? They suppose the admission of Texas to be fraught with evil to the nation, because it would be the means of extending and perpetuating slavery in this counrty. They regard slavery in the District of Columbia as a national reproach, and deeming Congress to have the power to abolish it there, they ask that it may be done. Certainly every State had the right to interest herself in matters which she believed relate to the general good. There was nothing, he contended, in the report offensive to the South, (certainly not intentionally offensive;) none of her rights or interests were assailed. Mr. P. was of opinion that much of the excitement which at present prevailed in the New England States, was occasioned by the manner in which this subject had been met by the people of the South.

Mr. STRANGE said a few words in reply to Messrs. SWIFT and PRENTISS, justifying the language in which he had characterized the Vermont report. Mr. S. as one of those complained of by the Vermont Senators, held that it was the duty of every honorable man whose language was complained of, either to retract or justify it. If he was conscious that he had characterized these documents in terms too harsh, or that they did not merit, it would give him great pleasure to acknowledge his error; but when he had uttered a truth, he never could retract it. He solemnly believed that the Vermont Legislature, when it passed these resolutions, had degraded itself by so doing; and he wished the Senators from Vermont to understand that when he spoke of the resolutions, he referred to the whole of them, as well as the report on which they were based. This report spoke of the base incendiaries who have been prowling from one part of the southern country to another, exciting the slaves to insurrection as martyrs to liberty, and recommended deeds of murder and arson. If he was to utter the real feelings of his heart, Mr. S. said that the gentleman from Vermont would have something more to complain of than the comparatively mild terms he had used. It was a gross libel on the people of the South to say that they were in a state of anarchy, as represented in that memorial. They had been justly characterized by the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Preston) as a law-loving people. It was a part of southern pride, and a pride that was highly commendable, that they were devotedly attached to the laws and institutions they themselves had created. One-half of the population of the country, Mr. S. said, was grossly insulted in this report. It was an attack on their feelings, their lives, and their personal security; for the language of this report directly applauded the man who should stir up a servile war in the South. Now Mr. S. asked if such a paper as that was to be received, and placed on the records of the Senate? Mr. S. ended by moving to lay the question of reception on the table, but withdrew it temporarily, at the request of Mr. KING.

Mr. KING observed that, when he took his seat this morning, he found the Senator from Vermont speaking on the resolutions of the Legislature of his State, which it appeared he had just presented. He (Mr. K.) had not supposed, from what had formerly taken place, that these resolutions would have been presented without some previous notice, so that those Senators whose States were attacked in them might be prepared to meet them. When, at a previous day, the Senator (Mr. Swift) introduced these resolutions, he (Mr. K.) had characterized them as they deserved. He understood the Senator had characterized his remarks as unbecoming. He had not heard the Senator. He asked him to say whether he would now, in his place, characterize his (Mr. K's) language as unbecoming?

Mr. SWIFT said he had no opinion on the subject, further than to say, that the people of Vermont would hold the gentleman's language for what it was really worth. As he was up, he would remark that he did not know, when he presented his resolutions, that the Senator from Alabama was not in his place.

Mr. KING resumed. He did not, on a former occasion, neither was it now his design to censure the conduct of the Senators from Vermont, in discharging what they supposed to be their duty. It rested with them (Mr. K. said) to discharge their duty according to the dictates of their own judgment; but he said to them, that in doing so, they must take the consequences if they present and sustain resolutions, accompanied by a report calculated to wound the feelings of those thus disrespectfully, thus slanderously spoken of. If they (the Vermont Senators) had acted in this matter as high-minded honorable men (as he doubted not they were) should, they would have taken care to free themselves from all participation in these resolutions, that they did not justly represent the characters of those of whom they complained. That they were not characterized by truth was known to those Senators. Why, then, in asking for their printing, be the means of promulgating these slanders? He could not (Mr. K. said) respect the course of the Vermont Senators. In presenting these resolutions, they had, in their remarks, indirectly endorsed the libels they contained; they could not—no man dared openly to endorse them here. He had characterized these resolutions as false and slanderous, he cared not who presented them. It had been said by the Senator from Vermont, that we of the South, as State rights men, could not refuse to receive and give a respectful attention to the proceedings of a sovereign State. Yes, sir, (said Mr. K.) we are State rights men—we defend the legitimate rights of the States, but we do not defend a sovereign State when she asserts calumny and falsehood. It was painful (Mr. K. said) to have to rise and defend the section of country he represented from the basest aspersions; he would not condescend to do it. Was there an honorable, upright man in the community, not blinded by fanaticism, who was capable of getting up on that floor and defending the language of that Vermont report? No: there was not one. Was it because he had characterized these resolutions as they deserved that he had been complained of by the Vermont Senators? Did they expect him, a Southern man, to speak of them only in the most soft and soothing language? No: the authors of this report might hear what he had said, and "take it for what it was worth," but he held men capable of making such charges in the utmost contempt, and he did not hesitate to avow it. For the people of Vermont he entertained the respect they were fairly entitled to, as a gallant, high minded, virtuous people; nor would he believe they could ever be brought to approve these slanders upon their brethren of the South. The whole tenor of this report was calculated to convey a false impression. It held that the people of the South, from the very circumstance of slavery existing among them, were a degraded, and not a law submitting people; that they of Vermont have always been opposed to slavery, and that it would be considered that they had cooled in their ardor for civil liberty if they should suffer themselves to be drawn into the fraternal embrace of slaveholding States. Now we of the slaveholding States, continued Mr. K. do not feel so proud of the fraternal embrace; we consider our own States as standing as high in honor and moral worth as any in this Union. But how did it happen, he continued, that the State of Vermont, with this ardor for civil liberty, suffered themselves to be drawn into the fraternal embrace with slaveholding States under the present Constitution—with the old thirteen? This fifth resolution, they had been told by the Senator from Vermont, was not passed by both branches of his Legislature. It had been shown that it was the result of a joint report, sanctioned by one branch and presented here for our adoption. It refers to what the gentleman called the slave trade. He would tell the gentleman that he had not characterized this resolution correctly. The South was as much opposed to the slave trade as any portion of the Union, and had been the first to move in its suppression. But that was not the question presented by this resolution. It was not levelled against the slave trade, which the South as well as the North condemned, but it went to violate the constitutional rights of the States—to prevent the transfer of slaves from one State to another, and was so utterly at variance with the Constitution that no man could justify it.

He had only risen for the purpose of vindicating himself from the charge that he had used discourteous language towards the people of a sovereign State, and having done so, he would, as far as he was concerned, leave the whole matter in the hands of gentlemen from non-slaveholding States, who might take it up and act upon it in their own way. If they chose to receive it and place it among the archives of the Senate, why let them do so; if they chose to refer it to a committee, let them do so; and he trusted that if they did, it would be to a select committee of gentlemen from the non-slaveholding States, and that they would make such a report as to show to the South the ground they intended to stand upon. For himself, Mr. K. said he intended to take no part in the matter, and he trusted that the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Strange,) would withdraw his motion.

Mr. STRANGE replied that he could not consent to withdraw his motion; on the contrary, h was the more convinced that he ought to persist in it. Mr. S. however withdrew it temporarily at the request of Mr. WHITE.

Mr. WHITE gave his views at length in relation to this subject. Part of the excitement, he said, in the non-slaveholding States, might have been produced by the manner in which these petitions had been treated. They suppose the right of petition and freedom of speech are violated by the course. He had voted against the reception of petitions asking to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, because he believed they violated the rights of the people here, and he had adopted that course as best calculated to allay excitement. Slavery was a settled question, in his opinion, not an open one; and he was not sent there to discuss the question whether it was immoral or irreligious. He argued that Congress had no power to abolish slavery in the District. Was it to follow that, because Congress was the only Legislature for this ten miles square, that it could do what it pleased, exercise a censorship over the press, or adopt any particular creed? The powers here were as necessarily limited as elsewhere. What power had Congress more than the Legislatures of the States to take the property of the citizen contrary to his will? When a man in a slaveholding State wishes to liberate slaves, the question arises, will the Legislature permit him to do so? They look to the great interests of the whole, and will not allow him to free his own slaves without making the rest of the community safe. It would be time enough when the people of this District come here and asked to be permitted to deprive themselves of their slaves, to legislate upon the subject. Mr. W. said, in treating with respect what came from one State, it was necessary to take care that, in so doing, we did not come under reproach from other States. If he voted for the reception of this, he believed it would be bringing reproach upon his own State and others, by indirectly admitting they were in a state of anarchy and confusion. Gentlemen of the non-slaveholding States should consider the exciting nature of these topics, and the danger connected with them, and before they charged those of the South with violence and excitement should place themselves in their situation. In the North they had white servants; and suppose the people of the South tell their domestics it is sinful and immoral for them to be held in a subordinate capacity, and that they might be relieved of their burdens by cutting the throats of their masters and mistresses while asleep, or putting poison in the victuals on which they were to feed! What would gentlemen think of such a course? Would they not be very likely to lynch those intruders, or would they wait the slow process of the law? In this whole matter the South had been misrepresented, and the resolutions of Vermont had done the grossest injustice to that portion of the country.

Mr. PRENTISS said a few words in too low a tone to be reported, defending the Vermont resolutions, and denying that there was any thing in the report or the resolutions to impeach the character of the South.

Mr. CALHOUN said that, as a States rights man, in the strongest sense, he believed that the State of Vermont had a right to come there and be heard. Upon the best reflection he could give to the subject, he could not vote for rejecting the resolutions, and, on the other hand, he considered the language to be so exceptionable that he could not vote for receiving them. It was owing to, and foreseeing this difficulty that he had introduced the series of resolutions, on the same subject, which had been so recently discussed and disposed of, and though he made no complaint, he profoundly regretted that he had been disappointed in getting a direct vote on one important principle involved. Situated as he was, he as a representative of the South, which was so vilely calumniated in these resolutions, he could not vote for receiving them.

Mr. ROANE observed that these resolutions came here with instructions to the Senators from Vermont to use their influence to carry out the objects for which they were passed. They were equally bound, he continued, to press them forward and get them acted on in that body. He entertained no doubt that there were assertions contained in these resolutions that he, as an individual Senator, could not allow to be true. On the other hand, as they came from a sovereign State, he could not say that he would not receive them. He intended, therefore, to stand neuter; and when these resolutions should be received, as no doubt they would by the votes of the members from the non-slaveholding States, and referred, he trusted that they would be referred to a committee from those States. From the report of a committee so constituted, at least one advantage would be gained: we shall understand, said Mr. R. their true position in regard to this matter; and further, he expected that these gentlemen, from their knowledge of the Southern States and those representing them, would show whether this Vermont report justly characterized the South and its institutions.

Mr. STRANGE having renewed his motion to lay the question of the reception of the resolutions on the table, the question was here taken and decided in the negative—Yeas 12, Nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Grundy, Lumpkin, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Strange, Walker, and White—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, Williams, Wright, and Young—26.

The CHAIR then said that the resolutions were before the Senate, and no one further objecting,

Mr. SWIFT said he would move that they be for the present laid on the table and printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that if the question was taken on printing, he hoped that it would be divided, and taken on printing the resolutions and accompanying report seperately. He wished to know distinctly whether the Senate would lend its aid to the publication of such a document as the latter.

Mr. SWIFT then varied his motion, so as to lay all the papers on the table, which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported the following bill; which was read, and passed to a second reading, and made the special order of the day for Tuesday, the 30th instant.

A BILL to impose additional duties as depositories, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of Public Money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys of the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, at as early a day as possible after the passage of this act, to require from the several depositories hereby constituted, and whose official bonds are not herein before provided for, to execute bonds new and suitable in their terms, to meet the new and increased duties imposed upon them respectively by this act, and with sureties and in sums such as shall seem reasonable and safe to the Solicitor of the Treasury, and from time to time to require such bonds to be renewed and increased in amount and strengthened by new sureties to meet any increasing responsibility which may grow out of accumulations of money in the hands of the depository, or out of any other duty or responsibility arising under this or any other law of Congress.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all collectors and receivers of public money, of every character and description, within the District of Columbia, shall, as frequently as they may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury so to do, pay over to the Treasurer of the United States at the Treasury thereof, all public moneys collected by them, or in their hands; that all such collectors and receivers of public moneys within the cities of Philadelphia and New Orleans shall, upon the same direction, pay over to the Treasurers of the Mints in their respective cities, at the said Mints, all public moneys collected by them, or in their hands; and that all such collectors and receivers of public moneys within the cities of New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, shall, upon the same direction, pay over to the Receivers General of Public Money in their respective cities, at their offices respectively, all the public moneys collected by them, or in their hands, to be safely kept, by the said respective depositories, until otherwise disposed of according to law; and it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to direct such payments, by the said collectors and receivers, at all the said places, at least as often as once in each month, and as much more frequently, in all cases, as he, in his discretion, may think proper.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer the moneys in the hands of any depository hereby constituted, to the Treasury of the United States; to the Mint at Philadelphia; to the Branch Mint at New Orleans; or to the officers of either of the Receivers General of Public Money by this act directed to be appointed; to be there safely kept, according to the provisions of this act; and also to transfer moneys in the hands of any one depository constituted by this act to any other depository constituted by the same, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys, and the convenience of the public service shall seem to him to require. And for the purpose of payments on the public account it shall be lawful for the said Secretary to draw upon any of the said depositories, as he may think most conducive to the public interests, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the moneys in the hands, care, and custody, of any of the depositories constituted by this act, shall be considered and held as deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be, at all times, subject to his draft, whether made for transfer or disbursement, in the same manner as though the said moneys were actually in the Treasury of the United States; and each depository shall make returns to the Treasury Department of all moneys received and paid by him, at such times, and in such form, as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That, whenever public moneys shall accumulate in the hands of any depository constituted by this act, other than the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurer of the Mint of the United States, the Treasurer of the Branch Mint at New Orleans, and the Receivers General of Public Money, to an amount beyond that secured by the bond of the officer, or which the Secretary of the Treasury shall, for any cause, consider unsafe, and it shall not be desirable to transfer the moneys so accumulated to any other depository, it shall be lawful for the said Secretary to direct the said moneys, or any portion thereof, to be specially deposited in such bank of the State, or Territory, wherein the depository who is to make the deposite is located, as he, the said Secretary, shall select and name: Provided, The bank so selected will agree to receive and keep the moneys deposited with it upon the terms and conditions in the next section of this act prescribed.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the special deposites of the public moneys authorized by the last preceding section of this act to be made in banks, shall be made upon the following terms and conditions, and upon no other, namely:

First. All such deposites shall be strictly special deposites; and the banks holding them shall be prohibited, in the most effectual manner, from making any use of the moneys deposited, by way of loans, discounts, or in any other manner, or for any other purpose whatsoever; and to secure the fulfilment of this condition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, to furnish the banks selected as deposite banks, with safes for the keeping of the public moneys exclusively, and under the joint control of the bank and some designated officer of the Government, or to adopt such other guards as he shall prefer.

Second. Nothing but gold or silver, or such notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed by law to be received in payment of the public dues, shall be offered for deposite, or received by the bank as a deposite, under the provisions of this act.

Third. All deposites shall be passed, upon the books of the bank, to the credit of the depository making the same; but no moneys deposited in pursuance of this act shall be withdrawn without the express order of the Secretary of the Treasury for the payment; and no drafts of the Treasurer of the United States; or orders or warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury, for ordinary transfer or disbursement, shall be made upon any bank selected as a deposite bank under this act.

Fourth. A commission, such as shall be agreed upon between the Secretary of the Treasury and the bank not in any case to exceed per centum upon the moneys deposited with it, shall be allowed and paid by the United States, in full satisfaction of all claims on the part of the bank for trouble and risk growing out of the receipt, safe-keeping and repayment of the special deposites herein authorized to be made, all accounts for commissions to be audited and paid at the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That, in case no bank within the State or Territory wherein the depository, directed to make deposites, is located, will consent to receive the moneys of the Government upon special deposite, according to the foregoing conditions and regulations, then it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to select some bank in an adjoining State, or Territory, such as may be most convenient for the officer to make deposites and the public service; and in case no convenient bank of either character can be found willing to receive such deposites upon the terms proposed, the Secretary may transfer the same to the Treasury of the United States, to the Mint, or Branch Mints, or to the offices of either of the Receivers General of Public Money, as shall be most convenient to the depository from whom the money is to be transferred, or to the wants of the public service in reference to disbursements.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause examinations to be made of the books, accounts, and money on hand, of the several depositories constituted by this act; and for that purpose to appoint special agents, as occasion may require, with such compensation as he may think reasonable, to be fixed and declared at the time of each appointment; which said examinations, in all cases where the sum on hand usually exceeds three-fourths of the amount of the officer's bond, shall not be made less frequently than once in each year, and as much more frequently, in those and all other cases, as the Secretary, in his discretion, shall direct. The agents selected to make these examinations shall be instructed to examine as well the books, accounts, and returns of the officer, as the money on hand, and the manner of its being kept, to the end that uniformity and accuracy in the accounts, as well as safety to the public moneys, may be secured thereby.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the examinations provided for in the last preceding section, and as a further guard over the public moneys, it shall be the duty of each Naval Officer and Surveyor, as a check upon the Receiver General of Public Moneys, or Collector of the Customs, of their respective districts; of each Register of a Land Office, as a check upon the Receiver of his Land Office; and of the Director and Superintendent of each Mint and Branch Mint when separate offices, as a check upon the Treasurers, respectively, of the said Mints, or the persons acting as such, at the close of each quarter of the year, and as much more frequently as they shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury to do so, to examine the books, accounts, returns, and money on hand, of the Receivers General of Public Money, Collectors, Receivers of Land Offices, reasurers and persons acting as such, and to make a full, accurate, and faithful return to the Treasury Department of their condition.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the said officers respectively, whose duty it is made by this act to receive, keep, and disburse the public moneys, as the fiscal agents of the Government, may be allowed any necessary additional expenses for clerks, fire-proof chests, or vaults, or other necessary expenses of safe-keeping, transferring and disbursing said moneys: all such expenses of every character to be first expressly authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, whose directions upon all the above subjects, by way of regulation and otherwise, are to be strictly followed by all the said officers.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, with as much promptitude as the convenience of the public business, and the safety of the public funds will permit, withdraw the balances remaining with the present depositories of the public moneys, and confine the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of those moneys to the depositories established by this act.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That all Marshals, District Attorneys, and others, having public money to pay to the United States, and all patentees, wishing to make payment for patents to be issued, may pay all such moneys to the Treasurer of the United States, at the Treasury, to the Treasurer of either of the Mints in Philadelphia or New Orleans, to either of the Receivers General of Public Money, or to such other depository constituted by this act as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in other parts of the United States, to receive such payments, and give receipts or certificates of deposite therefor.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That all officers charged by this act with the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys, are hereby required to keep an accurate entry of each sum received, and of the kind of money in which it is received, and of each payment or transfer, and of the kind of currency in which it is made; and that if any one of the said officers shall convert to his own use, in any way whatever, or shall use by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan, with or without interest, any portion of the public moneys entrusted to him for safe-keeping, disbursement, transfer, or for any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of the said moneys as shall be thus taken, converted, invested, used, or loaned, which is hereby declared to be a high misdemeanor, and any officer or person convicted thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of not less than two nor more than five years, and to a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That, in order to avoid inconvenient or injurious accumulations of gold and silver in the hands of the depositories of the Government, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever the amount of money in the Treasury of the United States, and standing to the credit of the Treasurer, in the hands of the several depositories, shall exceed in amount $4,000,000, to invest the surplus of such moneys in securities bearing an interest, and issued upon the faith and credit of the United States, or of some one of the States of the Union; in all cases of such investments as selecting such stocks, or securities as are transferrable by delivery or assignment, and from the rate of interest payable, the time or times they may have to run, and the prices they may bear in the market, shall seem to him best to answer the purposes for which the investments are directed, and at no time paying more than the current value in the market for any such stocks or securities. And whenever the amount of moneys in the Treasury, and standing to the credit of the Treasurer, shall be so much less than the said sum of $4,000,000, as to indicate to the Secretary that the moneys invested, or any portion thereof, will be required for purposes of public disbursement, then it shall be his duty to sell such portions of the stocks and securities purchased as may be necessary to keep the balance of money in the Treasury equal to its wants: Provided, That in all investments to be made in obedience to the provisions of this section, the said Secretary shall confine his purchases of stocks and securities, issued upon the faith and credit of any State to such as have been actually issued by the State, and shall not be at liberty to subscribe for, or otherwise purchase, those proposed to be issued and not in actual existence, as stocks and securities in the market.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That until the rooms, offices, vaults, and safes, directed by the first, third, fifth, and sixth sections of this act to be constructed and prepared for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurers of the Mints at Philadelphia and New Orleans, and the Receivers General of Public Money at New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, can be constructed and prepared for use, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to procure suitable rooms for offices for those officers at their respective locations, and to contract with such banks, incorporations, or individuals, as may be willing to contract for such use of their vaults and safes as may be required for the safe-keeping of the public moneys in the charge and custody of those officers respectively, the expense to be paid by the United States.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That from and after the thirty-first day of December, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, the resolution of Congress of the thirtieth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, so far as it authorizes the receipt in payment of duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the notes of specie paying banks, shall be so modified as that one-sixth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money accruing or becoming due to the United States, shall be collected in the legal currency of the United States; and from and after the thirty-first day of December, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, one other sixth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money shall be so collected; and from after the thirty-first day of December, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty, one other sixth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, shall be so collected; and that from and after the thirty-first day of December, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, one other sixth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, shall be so collected; and that from and after the thirty-first day of December, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, one other sixth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money shall be so collected; and that from and after the thirty-first day of December, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, the remaining sixth part of the said duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, shall be also collected in the legal currency of the United States; and from and after the last mentioned day all sums accruing, or becoming payable to the United States, for duties, taxes, sales of public lands, or other debts, and also all sums due for postages, or otherwise, to the General Post Office Department, shall be paid in gold and silver only, or in such notes, bills or paper, issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed to be received by law in payment of the public dues.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That from and after the thirty-first day of December, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, every officer or agent engaged in making disbursements on account of the United States, or of the General Post Office, shall make all payments in gold and silver coin only, or in such notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed to be received by law; and any receiving or disbursing officer, or agent, who shall neglect, evade, or violate, the provisions of this and the last preceding section of this act, shall be dismissed from the service, and shall forfeit all compensation then due to him.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and publish regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all Government drafts for payment at the place where payable, and to prescribe the time, according to the different distances of the depositories from the seat of Government, within which all drafts upon them respectively shall be presented for payment; and in default of such presentation, to direct any other mode and place of payment which he may deem proper.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That the Receivers General of Public Money directed by this act to be appointed, shall receive, respectively, the following salaries, per annum, to be paid quarter yearly, at the Treasury of the United States, to wit: the Receiver General of Public Money at New York shall be paid a salary of —— dollars per annum; the Receiver General of Public Money at Boston shall be paid a salary of —— dollars per annum; the Receiver General of Public Money at Charleston shall be paid a salary of —— dollars per annum; and the Receiver General of Public Money at St. Louis shall be paid a salary of —— dollars per annum; and these salaries, respectively, shall be in full for the services of the respective officers, nor shall either of them be permitted to charge, or receive, any commission, pay, or perquisite, for any official service of any character or description whatsoever; and the making of any such charge, or the receipt of any such compensation, is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor, for which the officer convicted thereof, before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be subject to punishment by fine, or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court before which the offence shall be tried.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States be and he is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury, and at such other points as he may designate, payments in advance for public lands, the payments so made, in all cases, to be evidenced by the receipt of the said Treasurer of the United States, which receipts so given shall be current at the several land offices of the United States, as cash, at any public or private sale of lands, in the same manner as the currency authorized by law to be received in payment for the public lands.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That for the purchase of sites, and for the construction of the offices of the Receivers General of Public Money, by this act directed to be erected at Charleston, South Carolina, and at St. Louis, Missouri, there shall be, and hereby is appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $——, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby required to adopt plans for the said offices, and the vaults and safes connected therewith, and to cause the same to be constructed and prepared for use with as little delay as shall be consistent with the public interests, and the convenient location and security of the buildings to be erected.

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That for the payment of the expenses authorized by this act, other than those herein before provided for, a sufficient sum of money be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the bill be made the special order of the day for this day week.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky expressed a wish for a longer day than the one named by the Senator from New York. This was an important subject; public expectation was very high on it, and he understood indirectly that the details of the bill were numerous, and he thought they ought not to hurry the consideration of a measure of such momentous consequences. He hoped the chairman of the committee would see the propriety of fixing on a day for the special order more distant than the one he had named.

Mr. WEBSTER was desirous of having as much delay as was consistent with the views of the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance. This was certainly one of the most important measures that would be likely to emanate from Congress this session. He was desirous, therefore, that the bill should be as generally understood as possible in all its bearings; and would move that fifteen hundred additional copies be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT said that, in making the motion, he was only acting under the instructions of the committee. The Senate could make what disposition it thought proper of the bill. He was not for pressing it.

Mr. CALHOUN opposed the delay. The subject, he said, was not new; it had been fully discussed at the last session, and every member had made up his mind on it.

The question was then taken, and the bill was made the special order for this day two weeks; ayes 22.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, fifteen hundred extra copies of the bill were ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, without amendment, the bill altering the terms for holding the circuit and district courts for the eastern district of Virginia.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs made a report on the memorial of Arkansas, in relation to the Osage Indians.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported unfavorably on the bill from the House for the relief of Freeman Brady; and favorably and without amendment on the bills from the House for the relief of Dr. David H. Campbell and Dr. James Heron.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill authorizing the sale of certain real estate, belonging to the United States, at Bath, Maine, and appropriating the proceeds of sale to the building of a custom house at that place: read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Moses Van Campbell; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of Thomas Curtis.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill for the establishment of a criminal court in the District of Columbia; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PRESTON, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Doctor Thomas Cooper; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SEVIER submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate all the papers of —— Duval, a Cherokee, now on file in the office of Indian Affairs, together with his opinion as to the liability of the United States for the depredations alleged to have been committed upon his property.

Mr. HUBBARD submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be authorized to appoint an additional member on the Committee on Claims, to serve during the present session; and that the rules of the Senate limiting the number of that committee to five be dispensed with, for the purpose above stated.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to take up the bill in addition to the act for the prevention and punishment of certain crimes against the United States, reported by him yesterday, and urged the speedy action of the Senate on it.

This motion was not carried, a quorum not voting.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

The Senate adjourned.

The SPEAKER communicated a letter from the Hon. JOHN C. CLARK, of New York, stating that the condition of his health was such that he was unable to attend to his duties on the Committee of Claims, and asking to be excused from further attendance thereon; which was agreed to, and the vacancy directed to be supplied.

Mr. HOWARD, on leave, and by request, as he stated, of the chairman thereof, submitted an order to allow the select committee on the memorial of the Sergeant-at-arms to sit during the sessions of the House; which was agreed to.

The first business in order was the consideration of the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. MERCER:

Resolved, That Messrs. GHOLSON and WISE, members of this House, between whom warm words have passed in debate, be required by the Speaker to declare in their places, that they will not prosecute farther the quarrel which has arisen this day between them.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. GLASCOCK to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. PATTON said that he had voted against laying the resolution on the table yesterday, but he was now satisfied that no benefit would result from further discussion, and he therefore moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. MERCER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were, yeas 126, nays 64.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The CHAIR then announced the special order, being the consideration of the subject of the Mississippi election case.

The question pending, was on the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. BRONSON.

Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Ward are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to their seats in the House as such.

Mr. BELL moved to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert one to the following effect, viz: that the resolution of the House of the 3d of October last, declaring that Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material in the case, and the same is hereby rescinded; and

Resolved further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Mississippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such.

Mr. PRENTISS addressed the House at great length, on behalf of the claim of himself and colleague to seats in the House, as members elect from the State of Mississippi, and without concluding, gave way to Mr. PATTON, who yielded the floor to enable an Executive communication to be presented.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, of the amount of dishonored checks and drafts on the deposite banks, since the 13th of May last.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

Laid on the table.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, January 17, 1838.

The VICE-PRESIDENT communicated to the Senate a report from the Secretary of War, in obedience to a resolution of the 10th instant, requiring information in relation to the payment of Indian annuities in goods, during the past year: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Commissioner of Patents; which was laid on the table, and 1500 extra copies ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, asking for the establishment of a pension agency at the seat of Government of that State. He would simply remark, Mr. C. said, that there was no pension agency within one hundred and fifty miles of that place: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the memorial of the Native American Society of the City of Washington, praying for a repeal or modification of the naturalization laws: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives, to have that part of West Florida lying south of the State of Alabama, and west of the Chattahootchie or Appalachicola, annexed to said State: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

COMMONWEALTH BANK OF BOSTON.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to obtain information, and lay the same before the Senate, with as little delay as possible; respecting any payments of pensions, by the late pension agent of Boston, or of fishing bounties, recently made by the collector at Boston, in bills of the Commonwealth Bank of that city; and the whole amount of such payments; and that he further inform the Senate by what authority or direction payment of such pensions and bounties has been made in such bills; and that he further inform the Senate whether any, and, if any, how much, of the public money of the United States is in deposite at said bank; and, if any of such money be therein deposited, at what time or times such deposites were made.

In presenting this resolution, Mr. W. said he felt it to be his duty to call the attention of the Senate to the circumstances here alluded to, at the earliest opportunity, in order to the instituuion of an official inquiry into the facts of the case, and to obtain information with respect to the manner in which the duty of public officers had been discharged, in reference to the causes, by which a severe loss had been made to fall upon a large number of industrious and meritorious citizens. Mr. W. did not submit this resolution for inquiry on the ground of mere newspaper rumor. He had received letters from highly respectable private sources, informing him of the general facts of the case. He understood the case to be that, at the period when the fishing bounties became due—money well and hardly earned, by a laborious, industrious, and worthy class of citizens—application for payment was made to the Collector at Boston, he being the officer charged on the part of the Government with the duty and business of paying this money. That officer paid the fishermen, not as the law directs, in specie, or bills equivalent to specie, but in the bills of this now broken bank, or in checks upon it, which checks, of course, it was known would not be paid in specie. Mr. W. had been given to understand that this officer refused to pay the bounty due in Treasury notes, when asked to do so; and that he refused also to pay the money in specie, although requested; and that, substantially and in effect, the parties entitled to payment were put to the option of taking the paper of this bank, or of taking nothing at all! This, he said, was his information.

Mr. W. held in his had a letter from one of the most considerable fishing towns in the State; namely, Marblehead; and he was thereby informed that, very shortly before this bank failed, that is, within a week or two, or some such period, the money due from Government to these fishermen had been paid in the manner described, a large amount of it entirely in the bills and notes of this bank. The whole amount of bills of this bank paid out by the Government officer on the part of Government, Mr. W. could not tell. In Marblehead alone his letter mentioned ten thousand dollars; and he heard of other similar payments, in other towns; report said, the whole amounting to fifty or a hundred thousand dollars, and paid out when the bank was on the eve of a total crash, and within a few days of its failure!

Well, sir, (continued Mr. W.) when the money in these large quantities had been paid out, the bank failed; and all that these poor fishermen had received in payment from the United States is now dead on their hands.

Mr. W. wished that a proper inquiry should be made by Congress into such a state of things, and for this object he had drawn the attention of the Senate to the circumstances of the case, with a view to the obtaining of information on two points: 1st, As to the facts how far the public officer of the Government had been engaged in paying out the notes of this bank for the dues of the United States; and, 2dly, As to the authority: that is, by what legal authority the officer of the United States Government had made such payments, and whether it was done by the direction of the Secretary of of the Treasury, or whether it had been permitted and allowed by him.

Mr. W. thought that however much gentlemen might differ in opinion as to the resolution of 1816, whether that resolution was the law of the land, or whether it were a mere recommendation or admonition, as some had maintained, (though Mr. W. himself had always considered it to be a law,) however that question might be settled, Mr. W. had thought that the law now existing, respecting payments by the Government, was at least clear and indisputable; so that no one would venture to defend the act of the Government, of paying in notes of banks known to be of less value than specie.

Mr. W. begged to refer to the solemn enactment of Congress, made only two years ago. It would be found in the second section of the appropriation bill of 14th April, 1836, and is as follows:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That hereafter no bank notes of less denomination that ten dollars, and that from and after the third day of March, anno Domini eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, no bank notes of less denomination than twenty dollars, shall be offered in payment in any case whatsoever in which money is to be paid by the United States or the Post Office Department; nor shall any bank note of any denomination be so offered, unless the same shall be payable, and paid on demand, in gold or silver coin, at the place where issued, and which shall not be equivalent to specie at the place where offered, and convertible into gold or silver upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to make any thing but gold or silver a legal tender by an individual, or by the United States."

Would any gentleman rise up and say, in the very teeth of the law, that the passing of these large amounts of notes, known not to be equivalent to specie, and immediately before the failure of the bank, was legal, was justifiable, either on the part of Government or its officers? The law expressly says "no public officer shall offer in payment bank bills not equivalent to specie on the spot where they are offered." Will it be said that the United States officer in the present instance did not know that these notes were not equivalent to specie? This is not possible; he knew this bank, like others, had not paid specie since May last; and that since that time its bills have not been equivalent to specie. Or will it be said he did not know the law? Certainly the Secretary of the Treasury must have drawn the attention of all disbursing officers to this act of Congress.

Mr. W. thought it possible that it might be said, in excuse of this transaction, that these poor fishermen and pensioners took this now worthless money voluntarily, or at their own option. But whether the individual who is to be paid may be made willing to take such irredeemable paper or not, the law is direct and peremptory, and prohibits the officer from offering it. The consent of an individual, therefore, to take it, especially when he can get nothing else, will not justify that violation in any quarter. But what consent can that be esteemed, what voluntary taking is there in such cases, where a man, because he cannot get all that is due to him, is compelled to take part, rather than have none? What is there voluntary about it? This is coercion, and not consent. Congress has not yet admitted the notion, and Mr. W. hoped it never would, that the receipt of paper under par was voluntary, whenever officers of Government could prevail on those who were entitled to the payment of money from the United States to take it under the penalty of getting nothing. His letter, indeed, said that specie had been asked for, and was refused; that, whether asked for or not, or whether the fishermen knew they were entitled to specie or not, it was equally the duty of the officer to refrain from offering these bills. Mr. W. therefore, wished to know by what authority Government, or the officers of Government, dispensed with the law? By what authority they repealed the statute, or disregarded it? By what license they had obtained the dispensing power?

It is (said Mr. W.) a notorious fact that no bank paper was, in the present state of the currency, equivalent to specie; it was refused by the Government, who demanded and obtained specie, or Treasury notes, for debts due to itself. How, then, could the collector of Boston be justified in passing bad money as a fulfilment of one of the most sacred duties of the Government, namely, the payment of the pensions of the aged and destitute Revolutionary pensioners?

It is said (though Mr. W. did not himself know the fact to be so) that there was a large amount of United States money in that bank. This was also a subject on which Mr. W. was desirous that some information should be given to the Senate, for he had heretofore understood that the public money had all, or nearly all, been drawn out of the bank. Mr. W. wished to know when, and by whom, this sum, now understood to be there, was deposited, or how it came there.

Mr. W. did not wish to anticipate debate on the Treasury system bill which was to be brought forward a fortnight hence; but he would, nevertheless, make a remark or two upon two points which he wished, as being important truths, might be kept in the constant view of Congress and the country.

The first was, that every notion and idea of justice required that there should be one mode of payment by the United States to all who were entitled to payments from Government or its officers. There was, at present, no uniform medium. Even the Treasury notes, which were issued to public creditors, were not all of equal value. Some of them carried interest at the rate of five per cent. some at the rate of two per cent. and some at the rate of one mill per cent. But an interest of one mill!! Mr. W. could not but consider it in the highest degree derogatory to the dignity and character of any Government, to create such a difference in its payments whereby the public creditor received a more or less valuable compensation, not according to his just demands, but according to his skill in making a bargain, according to his facility or difficulty of being put off with a larger or smaller amount!

The other point which he wished now and always to urge was, that it was his opinion that however desirable it might be, as some imagined it, to have gold and silver for Government use so long as there is a paper circulation in the country, it is not possible, in the nature of things, that Government can so conduct its transactions with the people, or keep itself safe, and keep them safe, while the general currency of the country is depreciated or deranged. In other words, there can be no safety, there can be no security nor confidence, even in transactions with Government, except by reforming and restoring the whole currency of the country, and establishing a general and uniform medium of payment. It is not possible for Government, with any practical utility, to have a sound currency only for itself; there must be such a currency for the people, and for the country generally. It will not be possible for the Government to stand apart, and strengthen itself, and take care of itself, and those who deal with it, and secure its own safety and theirs, while it neglects to provide for the safety, security and well-being of the whole country.

He would add nothing to these remarks, further than to say, that in this case, and in all similar cases, if loss should turn out to have been suffered by individuals in consequence of illegal payments made by officers of Government, or in consequence of payments made in a depreciated medium, if the officers themselves were not liable to make it good, he, for one, should vote to make good every such deficiency, to the utmost farthing, out of the Treasury.

The following is a copy of one of the letters referred to by Mr. WEBSTER in the course of his remarks, when he also, in referring to it, said, that it was at the service of every Senator to see and examine it. We conceive that the present mode will be the most convenient way of submitting it to general consideration:

"SIR: You will, I am satisfied, excuse the liberty I take in addressing you these few lines, the subject being of the utmost importance to my fellow-townsmen. The Government have lately paid to the fishermen of this town their bounty money, amounting to something like $20,000. Something like $10,000 of this amount was paid in Commonwealth Bank bills; the remaining $10,000 in bills of other banks. Now, sir, just look at the distress that is likely to come upon this poor town by this specie-paying Government of ours. The Commonwealth Bank has stopped, and $100 would not buy a loaf of bread. The Collector of Boston was solicited by a number of gentlemen of this town for specie, or even Treasury notes. No; he'd pay in no other way but by a check on the Commonwealth Bank. This, sir, is a hard case for the poor fishermen of this town, and I am satisfied you, sir, will do what lies in your power (if any thing can be done) for their relief. The poor widow and Revolutionary soldier come in also for their part in the distress of the town; many of them who have received pensions have been paid in Commonwealth Bank bills, and, having full reliance upon the Government, have kept the money they had paid them by the Government, believing that the Government would not pay them in bad money.

I am, dear sir, your obedient servant."

Mr. BAYARD inquired if the Senator from Massachusetts could say what particular connection there was, if any, between the Commonwealth Bank and the Government; and whether the collector at Boston, or any of the other officers of the Government, were directors of this bank, or had any particular connection with it.

Mr. WEBSTER replied that, from recollection, he should think himself justified in saying that the local officers of the Government had, more or less, been connected with the bank for a great while. He did not know that the collector was a director; but he believed the deputy collector was one of the directors; he was so recently; and the district attorney was also one of the directors. This bank was selected early as a depository of the public money. The gentlemen connected with it were very respectable, and very much distinguished for their political attachment to the last and present Administrations; and Mr. W. believed they were among the first who appeared here against the renewal of the charter of the late Bank of the United States; and gentlemen connected with the bank had not a little to do with the removal of the deposites from the Bank of the United States. This, however, Mr. W. said from recollection.

Mr. HUBBARD said that he had no objections whatever to the adoption of the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts; and if the Senator had presented his resolution unaccompanied with any remark, he should not have unsealed his lips upon the subject; but as that gentleman had seen fit to submit his views somewhat at large, not only with reference to the particular transaction in Boston, but generally upon the subject of the currency, he must ask the indulgence of the Senate in saying a word or two in answer. Before proceeding, however, he would wish to learn distinctly from that Senator whether he stated, or intended to be so understood, that the Secretary of the Treasury had given any authority, directly or indirectly, to any public officer, to pay any of the public creditors in any currency not expressly warranted by the act of Congress? whether the Senator intended to be understood by his remarks that the Secretary of the Treasury had any knowledge of, or any concern with, the transaction in Boston? whether that transaction were, or were not, censurable? whether it were, or were not, in violation of law? He would not wish to proceed before he received from the Senator an answer to these inquiries.

Mr. WEBSTER replied that he had designed to intimate nothing on this point. He did not know, and had, therefore, proposed this inquiry. It was, however, an important duty, (paying bounties and pensions,) and either was, or ought to be, directed by the superior of those who did it. But whatever the Secretary of the Treasury had determined, that the law should be broken, or whether he knew it was broken, or whether it was done by his determination, Mr. W. did not know, and gave no opinion. But if he might avail himself of the characteristic privilege of that community, and guess a little, he would conjecture that the honorable member from New Hampshire was already informed on this point; and Mr. W. was inclined to inquire whether it were not so. Mr. W. would also inquire whether there had not been, since May, 1837, hundreds of instances of the payment of money, not by the Secretary, but by his subordinate officers, in bank notes. Whether they had been made with the knowledge of the Secretary, Mr. W. did not know; but he knew the fact that his constituents had been so paid.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that the Senator was fully entitled to the character of a Yankee. He had answered his inquiries by submitting to him other questions.

The Senator asked him whether he had not heard the Secretary of the Treasury speak of this affair in Boston, and that the facts were within his knowledge; and whether there had not been since May, 1837, payments made to the public creditors in bank notes in numerous instances; and whether these things had not been done with the sanction of the Secretary; and whether he had not understood the matter from the Secretary himself. He wished not to evade the questions. He would most cheerfully and directly answer the gentleman's interrogatories. He had never received from the Secretary of the Treasury any such information.

The gentleman is answered, and answered truly; and, whatever might be the feeling of the Senator himself, such was his own confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury, that he would not for a single moment indulge the thought that he would connive at any violation of official duty in any public officer, or in any disregard (by any such officer) of the express provisions of the law. The Secretary of the Treasury could be guilty of no such breach of the public trust, and the Senator would not presume to make such a charge against him. The Secretary, so far from giving any authority to pay any of the public creditors in the paper of any bank since May last, that it had been his unceasing effort to dissolve all connection with the local banks, and to be prepared to receive and disburse in an entirely different currency.

An inquiry had been made, who were the directors and who were the stockholders of the Commonwealth Bank? He could not state from his own knowledge who were the directors or who were the stockholders. He lived remote from the place where the bank was located, and had never had any concern whatever with the institution; but there was not a Senator on this floor who was better informed on this point than the Senator from Massachusetts; but he was very certain that the collector was not, and never had been, a director of that bank; and whether he was, or was not, a stockholder he was unable to say.

He had said that he should interpose no objection to the passage of the resolution. If the object be to get facts, be it so; but the Senator has very plainly intimated, not only that the collector has, without law and against every moral sense, paid these creditors in the bills of the Commonwealth Bank, but has insinuated that this was done by the authority—certainly with the knowledge—of the Secretary himself. He had no doubt that if the Senator entertained any such suspicion, that he would find himself egregiously mistaken. He ventured to predict, that the Secretary of the Treasury had never acted so regardless of his high trust, as to give directions to any subordinate officer to pay the public creditors in a depreciated currency; and he also believed that the subordinate officer referred to had, on no occasion, acted so regardless of his official duty, and of public law, as to offer any such depreciated currency, without right, to satisfy the claims of public creditors. If the fact should be otherwise, he would not be behind the gentleman from Massachusetts in expressing his strongest disapprobation.

The Senator from Massachusetts had contended that it was a direct or partial violation of the act of Congress of April, 1836, for any public officer to offer in payment to a creditor of the Government any bank notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars, or any bank note, unless the same shall be payable and paid on demand in gold or silver, even at the place where issued, and which shall not be equivalent to specie at the place where offered, and convertible into gold or silver at the spot at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him. All this is true: such are the clear and unequivocal provisions of the act of 1836; and he was as ready and as willing as the Senator could be, to condemn that public officer who should offer, or attempt to pass, depreciated bank paper of any denomination. He knew well the terms of that act; and he knew well, also, that in the same act was reiterated the sentiment that nothing but gold or silver should be regarded as a legal tender by the United States. But in admitting all this, he by no means admitted that the collector at Boston had violated that law, (even if the public creditors named by the Senator had been paid in the bills of the Commonwealth Bank.) He would not deny that since May last the bills of that bank, and the bills of all the other banks in the city of Boston, had been of a less value than specie. This had been, and still was, to a very great extent, the true condition of the bank paper of the whole country. But the Senator would not deny that the bills of the Commonwealth Bank had been, up to the hour of its failure, as current as the bills of any other bank in that city. They were used like the paper of other banks, for all the purposes of commerce and of business between man and man. Before the Senate can declare that the collector of the port of Boston is obnoxious to the charge of having violated an act of Congress, the facts must be known. The circumstances of the whole case must be well understood. The private and the public character of that officer, and his known faithfulness in the performance of his official duties, forbid the idea of any wilful violation of law, or of any unwarrantable departure from duty. He had said that even if the fishermen had received the bills of the Commonwealth Bank in payment of their fishing bounties, it did not necessarily follow that the collector had either departed from his official duty, or violated the provisions of the law. The Senator has supposed a state of facts, which, he was free to admit would amount to a wanton and wilful violation of the act of Congress. He has stated that these fishermen demanded gold or silver, which was refused; that they demanded Treasury notes, which were refused; and that they were told by the collector that he would pay them only in bills of the Commonwealth Bank. If this be so, he would not attempt to justify the conduct of the collector. If he had gold or silver, and refused to pay it to these creditors when demanded, or if he had Treasury notes, and refused to deliver them when demanded—if he persisted in satisfying these creditors of the Government in the bills of the Commonwealth Bank, and did so satisfy them, he was obnoxious to the charges which had been made against him. He should, however, most reluctantly yield his assent to the statement made by the Senator, on the authority of any epistolary correspondence.

But if the creditors of the Government called upon this public officer, whose duty it was to make the disbursement, and said expressly to that officer that they desired payment to be made to them in the bills of the Commonwealth Bank—that they were not only willing, but it was their wish to receive payment in that particular currency—could the collector fairly be charged with a violation of the law, if he should thus comply with the wishes of these creditors? Would not the act be most unjustifiable on the part of the collecter, to withhold from the creditor the very means which it was known the collector possessed, and the very means which the creditors were most willing and most desirous to receive? It is the intent, the motive, which gives character to the transaction. And with what grace, with what propriety, could the collector be charged either with a departure from duty, or with a violation of law, for thus conducting? The creditor might well know that the collector had not the specie—that he was not supplied with gold or silver—and yet might desire payment in the very kind of money with which the collector was furnished. The creditors would, under such circumstances, say to the collector—"pay us in the bills of the Commonwealth Bank; they will answer our purpose; they will enable us to pay our debt to the bank; they will supply us with means necessary for the support of our families." The collector complies with this request of the creditors; and he was unable to see, in this supposed case, wherein the collector had done aught worthy of censure or of condemnation.

If the collector had refused to comply with this request of the creditors—if he had said to them, "I cannot offer you the bills of the Commonwealth Bank, because they are not equal to specie, and are not convertible into gold or silver upon the spot," and had actually withheld from the creditors this kind of money, which they were so ready and so willing to receive, he would like to know what would then have been said of the collector. What would the Senator from Massachusetts have said of such conduct on the part of the collector. He was sure that it would receive universal condemnation. There are many men who would prefer to receive paper to specie, who would prefer current bank bills to gold and silver, for the purpose of transacting the ordinary business of life; and, for himself, he was free to say, that were he to receive, for his own use, from any individual, a sum of money, as it is not his fortune long to hold, what he is entitled to receive; as he has ever had, and probably always shall have, an immediate use for all his pecuniary means—he would much prefer to receive current bank paper to gold or silver; it would suit his convenience better; and for that very reason, when he was fairly entitled to gold or silver, and could have received either, he has preferred to take current bills, and has been content therewith. He dare say that others might think and might act as he thought and acted; yet he was by no means for substituting, for the use of the Government, paper money for gold and silver. He had mentioned these facts, to show that such may have been the circumstances, in relation to the disbursement made by the collector at Boston in satisfaction of fishing bounties, as wholly to exonerate him from the charge of "a violation of law—of a disregard of his public duty."

The Senator had presented another view of this matter. He had regarded it with reference to the rights of the fishermen, and with reference to the rights of the pensioners, who, it is stated, have also received their pittance in the bills of the Commonwealth Bank. And he had said to the Senate that he should feel himself called upon to indemnify these public creditors from any loss they may have sustained in receiving this kind of money; that they were entitled to gold or silver, or to an equivalent; that having been paid in this depreciated currency, they were justly entitled to have the difference in value between this description of paper and gold and silver, made up to them. There might possibly be a case which would present a good claim upon Government. Such cases have occurred; they may again occur; but he would like to learn from the Senator what principle of morals or of law, what claim in justice or in equity, these creditors could have upon the Government, if they have voluntarily, at their own instance and request, received in payment current money, and which has depreciated in their hands?

The Senator says that it is idle to talk of a voluntary taking in payment that which is of a less value than gold or silver; that it is necessity, dire necessity, which compels the creditor to receive a depreciated currency; that it is a wrong on the part of the Government to offer such a currency in payment; and that the act of taking such sort of money in payment of an honest claim, would not stop him from making the money so received equal to the precious metals. There may be, as he had before stated, cases justly calling upon the Government for remuneration. They must be, however, of a very different character from any which the Senator himself had mentioned. The Government is bound to satisfy its creditors. This obligation rests no more upon the Government than upon individuals. Every man is bound, in honesty and in good faith, to pay his debts: the Government is equally bound. An individual may honestly, may justly, may with perfect fairness, satisfy the claim of his creditor, without advancing either gold or silver. The Government may also satisfy its creditors, without the aid of hard money. A voluntary receipt of payment, a willing acknowledgment of satisfaction, was, according to his creed of morals, according to his notions of law and of right, the end of the matter; and it would be a most flagrant act of injustice and of wrong for an individual, under such circumstances, to appeal to Congress for indemnity from a loss occasioned by a depreciation of the very paper in which he had received payment, after it had passed into his hands. As he had before stated, a creditor having a claim upon the Government, calls upon the collector at Boston for payment, and designates the very money in which he wishes payment to be made to him. He neither asks gold or silver, but receives, with his own consent, at his own request, and to his heart's content, current bank bills.

What right, what sense of morals, what principle of law, would sanction an appeal to Congress to make good to the creditor any loss which he might subsequently sustain, or to make that which he elected to receive, equal to specie, which he at the time spurned? He knew of no right, and he could realize no moral sense or legal principle which could justify such an appeal. And he would only say to the Senator, before he pledges himself to give his support to such applications, first to put the Government in the wrong; to show that gold or silver are within her reach, and that she has wilfully withheld it from her honest creditors. Let the Senator first show that, by the existing policy of the country, the public revenues are necessarily received in the metallic currency; and the same currency should be disbursed to satisfy Government liabilities. If he could show this, he would have much better and safer ground to stand on. He hoped that the time was not far distant when the Government would collect and disburse its revenue independent of banks.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that the public creditors should be paid in gold and silver; that they are entitled to receive hard money in satisfaction of their claims upon the Government; that any thing short of this would be doing great injustice to them; and a payment in any currency of a less value than gold or silver would also be a direct violation of law. He was rejoiced to hear this from the honorable Senator. He had declared, on this and another occasion, that he should be ready at all times to vote to any creditor a remuneration for any loss he may have sustained by receiving from the Government any currency in payment of his claim, if that currency was, at the time, of a less value than gold or silver. After the avowal of such sentiments, he trusted that the gentleman from Massachusetts would be found cooperating with him in the support of that very system which contemplates an entire separation of the Government from the banks; which looks to the very object which the Senator seems to have so much at heart—the exclusive collection of the revenue in gold or silver; which is intended to provide the very description of means which the Senator himself says, and says most truly, the public creditors are entitled to claim, and which the Government is bound to pay. The Senator would hardly contend that this Government ought to collect its revenues in a paper currency, and disburse those revenues in gold or silver; and he congratulated himself and his friends that they were to have the aid of the powerful talents of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in sustaining the Sub-Treasury system—a system which is to cut loose from all local banks; which is intended to collect from the debtors of the Government hard money, and to disburse to the public creditors the same currency. This subject of the currency, he was free to admit, was of great importance to the whole community; and the bill which had been recently reported from the Committee on Finance ought to have received the earliest possible consideration from the Senate. It was due to the Government, it was due to the country—a sense of common justice seemed to him to demand an immediate action upon this all-important measure; and although its importance has been admitted, yet the Senator, by himself and friends, has put this subject beyond the power of the Senate for two weeks to come. He regretted this; and he could not but hope that some Senator who voted with the majority would move this morning for the reconsideration of the vote postponing that bill. He wished for its immediate consideration. He desired to have it taken up, examined, debated, and disposed of, without delay. Recent events called loudly upon the Senate for action. The very occurrence in the city of Boston which has induced the resolution now before the Senate, demands from this body the earliest possible consideration of the measure reported yesterday from the Committee on Finance.

He looked forward with deep solicitude for the adoption of that measure. He was certain that all were ready to admit that the time had come when all connection between the Government and the local banks should be dissolved. That any man who will look abroad and see for himself; that any man who will faithfully realize the consequences—the disastrous consequences—which have resulted, and which are daily resulting, from that connection, must admit that the honor of the Government, the prosperity and peace of the community, and the best interests of the local banks, al demand a divorce, a permanent, a lasting, separation between them and the Government.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had, on a former occasion, and had, on this occasion, seen fit to allude to the manner in which the Executive had executed the Treasury note law of the last session; and he asked, with his usual confidence, whether there was any member of the Senate who was prepared to justify the course of the Executive under that act. He said he had heard of but one individual who had approved the course. The gentleman from Massachusetts said that he believed that the spirit of that act had been perverted, if not its letter violated.

He had on the former occasion, by a resolution, called on the Secretary of the Treasury for information. He had received an answer to that call; it was in the possession of the Senate; and, for one, he hesitated not to declare, in the most unequivocal manner, that the law had been executed, and faithfully executed, according to its letter and its spirit. Was that act designed to give authority to the Executive to borrow ten millions of dollars? Was such the conclusion of the committee who reported the bill? Was such the debate on this floor? He denied the fact. The bill was intended to be, what it purports to be, a bill for the accommodation and convenience of the Treasury Department—a bill to enable the head of that department to carry on the fiscal operations of the Government without embarrassment. The funds, the whole pecuniary means, of the Government, by one universal and sad catastrophe, had been put beyond the immediate control of the Treasury Department. This was then a mere temporary measure—a relief bill; and what are the terms of this bill? That the President is to cause Treasury notes to be issued to an amount not exceeding ten millions of dollars, and not of a less denomination than fifty dollars; that they were to be redeemed after the expiration of one year, and were to bear no interest after the expiration of said year. The rate of interest is to be expressed upon the face of the notes. The bill provides that the rate of interest upon each several issue of notes shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President, but the rate of interest shall in no case exceed six per centum per annum.

Language could not make this matter more plain; it seemed to him that there is no room for cavil. The notes are not to draw interest after the expiration of one year; and the rate of interest is to be fixed by whom? By the Secretary of the Treasury. It is not prescribed by the act itself; the only limitation is, that the rate shall not exceed six per centum per annum. Beyond that the Secretary has no power to go; but up to this point the rate of interest is committed to the discretion of that officer, with the approbation of the President. The Senator admits the authority to fix the rate at six per cent. Whence is that authority derived? From the act itself: and by the same act the Secretary can fix any less rate of interest, according to his discretion. If he has power, which none can deny, to fix the rate at six, he has equally the right to fix it at two. The Secretary is at perfect liberty to act, with reference to this whole matter, as his own good sense and sound discretion should dictate. He might find one portion of the community ready to part with their gold and take notes bearing an interest of ten per cent.; he might find another class willing to receive them at a less rate of interest; he might find others requiring a higher rate of interest; he might find a class of public creditors who would receive these notes at one mill interest. The Secretary had only one limit; he could not fix the rate at over six per centum per annum. The rest was entirely and most properly left to his discretion, to be exercised as circumstances should require.

And is there a Senator on this floor prepared to say, that if he had applied to the Secretary, and said that he would part with his gold for Treasury notes at one per centum per annum, that the Secretary could not, consistent with that discretion with which he was invested by the act, accept the offer? The Secretary either had or had not the power to regulate the interest according to his own discretion. And this matter must be determined by the inspection of the law itself. To the law then he would appeal, and to the terms of that act of Congress he would submit. But if there is any thing clear in legislation, free from all ambiguity and doubt on this subject, it is to be found in that act of Congress of the last session, giving authority for the issue of Treasury notes.

If the act does not speak the language which the gentleman from Massachusetts intended it should, or supposed it did, the Secretary cannot be blamed. If the act was designed merely to give authority to the President to borrow money, why was not the act in terms so drawn? If it was intended that Treasury notes should be issued, only at such a rate of interest as would enable the Government to go into the market and convert them at once into specie, why was the purpose of the act kept out of view? Why was not its intent fully declared? If such had been the exclusive object of the law, it would have been necessary at the time to have fixed the maximum of interest at a much higher rate than six per cent. These were not the exclusive objects of the bill. The Secretary might find it necessary to make an issue of Treasury notes to supply himself with gold and silver for the public use. He might make an issue of these notes to satisfy the public creditors. He was bound to receive them back for all public dues; and whether issued for one purpose or another, the rate of interest was matter for Executive regulation, and expressly committed to Executive discretion. There was but one limitation to the exercise of that discretion, and that has already been stated. He had not only thoroughly examined the act of the last session, but he had carefully perused the remarks of the honorable Senator made to the Senate a few days past in relation to this matter; and he had brought his mind to the conclusion that the Executive had, in the execution of that act, not only complied with its provisions in letter and in spirit, but had also, in its execution, faithfully and honestly regarded the best interests of the country. He was not one of those to complain of the Executive for not having issued these Treasury notes at a rate of six per cent. when all the purposes of the Government could be as well attained by fixing the rate at one or two per cent.

The gentleman from Massachusetts may condemn this act of the Executive; he may find others to agree with him; he may think that the law has been wholly perverted, and its purposes unaccomplished. All that he had to say was, that if such were the opinions of the Senator, he wholly differed from him in sentiment. In the execution of this act, the Executive has done his duty, and his whole duty. He had looked upon the resolution which the Senator had offered the other day—and he looked upon this resolution just presented by the Senator—as a thrust at the head of the Treasury Department. That officer did not seem to enjoy the confidence of the Senator. As the friend of the Secretary, he could not desire a more perfect protection from the attack made upon his public conduct, than was afforded him from the implied charge involved in the resolution presented by the Senator, with reference to the manner of executing the Treasury note law of the last session.

With reference to the last branch of the resolution, he would remark, that he was perfectly sure that the Secretary of the Treasury has not made any deposite of the public funds since May last, in any of the selected banks which had refused to redeem its bills with specie. There may be, and there probably was, in deposite in the Commonwealth Bank some portion of the public money; but the Secretary of the Treasury could not have so disregarded his public duty as to have made such a deposite since the suspension of specie payment. If any of the public funds were now in that bank, they must have arisen from transfer drafts, drawn in favor of that bank previous to May last, and which drafts may have been answered since; he had from some quarter been informed that by the shipment of cotton to the North, such a transfer draft had been complied with by one of the southern banks, and its amount had been placed to the credit of the Government in the Commonwealth Bank. He therefore stated, that if there were any portion of the public money now in deposite in the Commonwealth Bank, it had occurred in the way and manner he had stated; for the fact was known to him, and he presumed, to the Senator from Massachusetts, that the necessities of the Government had induced the Treasury Department to draw very closely upon the northern deposite banks; and in the course of the summer and autumn, by reason of the failure of the southern and southwestern banks to answer the Treasury drafts, that almost every dollar of the public money in the deposite banks, in New England, had been drawn for. He was, therefore, well satisfied that the Secretary of the Treasury would be found to be in no way blameable for the money which may now be in deposite in the Commonwealth Bank. But he trusted that in case there was a portion of the public money now in deposite in that bank, the bond which the Secretary of the Treasury had required, and which he had taken, would be found to be fully adequate for the protection of the Government against any ultimate loss.

Mr. NILES did not rise to prolong a debate, so unnecessarily commenced. He was not opposed to the inquiry sought by the resolution, but was rather in favor of it. He presumed the object of the mover was to obtain information, to be laid before this body, in relation to the great financial operations of the Government; and he also presumed that the gentleman was looking at higher game; that his object was to get at the connections of this Government with the deposite banks. That (said Mr. N.) is also my object; and whether these banks were in the hands of one party or the other, was entirely another question. Let us (said Mr. N.) have the whole fruits of this system before us, the bitter as well as the sweet. For this purpose, and not to oppose or retard the inquiry, but to get all the information necessary for the guidance of the Senate before them, he submitted the following amendment:

"And that he further report to the Senate whether the late Bank of the United States has yet paid, or accounted with the Government, the sum of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, fraudulently detained, on the pretence of a claim of damages for the non-payment of the draft drawn on the French Government, and also to report what loss the United States have sustained by depositing the public revenues in banks, or by receiving the notes of banks which have failed, or their bills become depreciated."

Mr. WEBSTER said the latter part of this additional call would require a great deal of time; and if it was insisted on, he hoped the member would agree to offer it as a separate resolution, and not delay an answer to his (Mr. W's) call, which it was desirable to have immediately, by attaching this amendment to it.

Mr. NILES then modified his amendment, so as to require the answer on the first branch of the inquiry immediately, and on the latter part as soon as possible.

Mr. BAYARD objected to the word "fraudulent" in the first part of the amendment It was true the bank detained the money, but they claimed it, and were ready to abide a legal adjudication. He hoped the Senate would not attempt to characterize the transaction by the term. That matter should be decided on by another tribunal.

Mr. NILES replied, that as the gentleman seemed very sensitive in relation to that bank, he would substitute the word unjustly for fraudulently, though he believed the transaction both fraudulent and unjust.

Mr. BAYARD said there was the same objection to the word unjustly as to fraudulently. Why express any opinion? He disclaimed any sentiveness about the bank, but was averse to the Senate expressing an opinion in this matter. Mr. B. then moved to strike out unjustly.

Mr. STRANGE said that, had the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Webster) introduced his resolution unaccompanied by any remarks, he would have cheerfully voted for it, and opposed the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. Niles,) as well as every other amendment calculated to embarrass the original resolution. The Senator from Massachusetts had professed a great unwillingness, and indeed a determined purpose, not to anticipate the debate upon the most important measure likely to engage the attention of Congress at its present session. I leave motives, said Mr. S. to the great Searcher of Hearts; but of the conduct of men, which is immediately before me, I have a right to judge, and to speak of its tendency. The resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts proposes an inquiry, and yet, in anticipation of the answer to his inquiry, he furnishes us with ex parte statements of facts, upon which he makes his own comments, answering in advance the very inquiry which he makes. Now, I might appeal to the Senator himself whether, whatever may be his motives, he does not believe the facts he has disclosed, and the comments he has made upon them, are calculated to make an impression upon the public mind affecting the great question which has been for some months before the country? The answer, I know, must be affirmative; and I, for one, can not consent that these facts and comments should go forth unaccompanied by comments from another quarter. Every one knows that the Senator from Massachusetts is in favor of a United States Bank; that he is opposed to the present Administration, and both to the Sub-Treasury system, as it is called, and the system of deposites with the State banks; and he doubtless supposes that the facts he has disclosed have a tendency to convince the country of the necessity of a United States Bank. Now, sir, believing, as I do, that they lead to a very different conclusion, (admitting the facts stated to be true, and I am not now disposed to question them) I feel it my duty to say so.

I must, however, in the first place, endeavor to show that the charge of illegal conduct so suddenly brought against the Collector of the port of Boston, and which the Senator from Massachusetts seems to think he has triumphantly made out, is altogether groundless. Allowing the fact assumed by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Collector had paid out to Government creditors the notes of the Commonwealth Bank of Boston, to be true, I must admit the conduct of the Collector to be in collision with the act of 14th April, 1836; but the proof adduced by the Senator from Massachusetts does not support the existence of that fact. Now, sir, I have no information upon the subject except that derived from the letter read by the gentleman himself; and it is plain, that although both the gentleman himself and his correspondent have jumped to the conclusion, that the collector of the port of Boston had paid out Commonwealth Bank notes to Government creditors, the fact is otherwise. The Collector it is true has given checks upon the Commonwealth Bank, but has not paid out a dollar of its notes; and the two things are, in my judgment, altogether different. The act of April, 1836, prohibits the disbursing officers of the Government from paying out the notes of any bank which are not equivalent to specie. The payment of the notes of the Commonwealth Bank to a public creditor, would be a violation of this act. But the Collector has not paid out the notes of the Commonwealth Bank, and therefore has not in that respect violated the law. But he has given checks on the Commonwealth Bank. True, and where is the law prohibiting his doing so? On the contrary, is he not in so doing, acting in direct conformity with the law? Your deposite act requires all public officers to deposite the public moneys with State banks to be selected. The Commonwealth Bank was one of those selected, and consequently it was the duty of the Collector to make his deposites there. Being made, what was to become of them? When a public creditor applies for his money, what can the disbursing officer do, but give him a check upon the deposite bank? This check, when presented, is redeemable in specie; and when so presented, and not redeemed, who is to blame, the officer or the bank? If the creditor, who has a right to make his own arrangements with the bank, chooses, rather than protest the check and look to the Government for indemnity, to take the bank's own notes in payment, of whom has he a right to complain? not of the Government surely or its officers. I have thus noticed as briefly as possible this charge of illegal conduct against the officer. A few words now upon the main subject. The Senator from Massachusetts says there should be one common medium for the payment of all public creditors from the highest to the lowest—from Maine to Florida. In this I fully agree with him. The Senator doubtless thinks that a United States Bank only can furnish this common medium, and to this conclusion he wishes the public mind to come. In this I do not agree with him. Gold and silver, in my opinion, are the only things which, by the laws of nature, can be this common and immutable medium. I admit the argument is so far in favor of a United States Bank, as its notes will approximate this great standard more nearly than the notes of local banks. But the argument does not stop there; it leads us irresistibly past a United States Bank to that standard sanctioned by nature, time, and universal usage, by which all values must be tested, the precious metals. Upon this broad foundation the Sub-Treasury is based, supported as it is by the facts, admissions and comments, just furnished by the Senator from Massachusetts. A sort of dialogue has taken place between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Delaware (Mr. Bayard) in which it has been brought out that the officers of the Government, or some of them, are in some way connected with the Commonwealth Bank, either as stockholders, or officers, or both. For what purpose these things have been thus dramatically brought forward every one must judge for himself; but if these things be so, they furnish a strong argument for a dissolution of all connection between the Government and the banks. As has been said by the Senator from Connecticut, human nature is human nature, and banks are banks. As long as the public officers may be connected with banks—and there is no law prohibiting their being so—it is natural that they should think most favorably, and be most anxious for the prosperity, of the banks with which they are so connected, and thus a most subtle and corrupting appeal is made to their hearts to mould their official conduct conformably to the best interests of those banks. The Sub-Treasury system cuts us off from this source of corruption, and thus improves our political condition. Having thus shown, as he conceived, that two strong arguments were furnished by the facts disclosed by the Senator from Massachusetts in favor of the Sub-Treasury system, and that the public officer at Boston, so far as yet appeared, had not transgressed the law, he would not longer detain the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER, with a view to prevent further debate, read the whole of the letter from which he had chiefly derived the facts which he had stated. Mr. W. also repelled the imputation of having any indirect object whatever in view.

Mr. STRANGE rejoined that this was no personal affair between him and the Senator from Massachusetts, but a matter of great public concern. He had been anxious, therefore, that the present transaction might go before the country in its true light. The effect of the Senator's remarks, whatever might be his object, was to impugn the conduct of the collector of the port of Boston, and to show that nothing could save us from dishonesty in our fiscal dealings, and corruption in the administration of our revenue, but the establishment of a U. S. Bank. Believing that the charge against the officer was groundless he (Mr. S.) had offered a few words in his vindication, showing that payment in the notes of a bank, and giving checks thereon, had been improperly confounded; that while one was illegal and the other not, the officer had done that only which was legal; that if the creditor had received any notes in payment of the check, it was a voluntary arrangement between him and the bank. In farther illustration of which, he would refer to the practice which had been adopted from the necessities of the Government, produced by the infidelity of the banks, of issuing warrants, which being protested, were put forth in lieu of other modes of payment. The public officers having no mode of payment but checks on the deposite banks were not only justified, but would have been guilty of a breach of duty, had they hesitated in giving these checks, and when given, it was for the creditor either to receive payment from the banks in what they might offer, or protest them, and look to the Government. Upon the other branch of the subject, Mr. S. had endeavored to show that the facts disclosed by the Senator from Massachusetts, instead of proving the necessity of a United States Bank, showed fully that nothing could render us just as debtors, and free us from corruption in our fiscal administration, but a total disconnection with all banks, and the receipt and disbursement of our revenue in gold and silver.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama had no objection to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts. It was one of inquiry merely, purporting to inquire into the conduct of certain public officers—the collector of the port of Boston, and perhaps the Secretary of the Treasury. To this inquiry not a single member of the Senate had offered, or would have offered, the slightest objection; it would have passed without debate, had not the Senator himself thought proper to accompany its presentation with remarks, in his opinion, altogether premature and unnecessary. He (Mr. C.) was as ready as any man, when facts were adduced, to pass censure on the conduct of public men; but his object in rising was to protest against the course taken by the Senator from Massachusetts, passing censure on public officers by means of inferences drawn from facts not yet established. He protested against implicating the conduct of public men on a mere inquiry to elicit facts, and he protested against any man rising in his place and endorsing ex parte statements in the letters of his correspondents or in newspapers. In all conscience (Mr. C. said) the newspapers are licentious enough, and he hoped that this licentiousness was not to be transferred to this body. He need not say whether the individuals thus unnecessarily implicated were guilty or innocent, but justice required that their guilt or innocence should not be pronounced on till the facts of the case were brought out. This was not only in accordance with the principles of constitutional law, but with the immutable principles of eternal justice. He had said that there would have been no objection to the immediate adoption of the resolution without debate or amendment, had not the Senator from Massachusetts himself accompanied it by remarks calculated to implicate public officers in advance. As it was his wish that all the facts should be brought out, he would vote for the resolution, and also for the amendment; but he could not, by silence, give his sanction to implications thus cast on individuals before they were heard in their defence. Would it be contended that it was either immoral or illegal to pay that kind of money to a man which he is willing to receive? If so, Mr. C. said it must be founded on a system of ethics, and principles of law, entirely new to him. Till he saw some authority to sustain the position, he could not assent to its soundness,

To establish the doctrine that a man who had voluntarily received bank bills, which afterwards became depreciated, could claim the amount of depreciation, would lead to most ruinous consequences—would unsettle thousands of transactions, and throw society into utter confusion.

But, Mr. C. repeated, his object in rising was not to engage in the discussion, but to protest against Senators rising in their places, and making charges by insinuation against the characters of men, before the facts are known, or can be known, and before they have had an opportunity of explaining or defending their conduct. He was aware that the privileges of this body had been pleaded as a sanction to this unwarrantable practice; but he was not for allowing privilege to shelter the member whose imputations injuriously affect the character of an absent individual; and Mr. C. said he would take this occasion to say, if a constituent of his were assailed in this manner, privilege or no privilege, he should hold the assailant as a calumniator; and if he undertook to avail himself of the protection of his privilege, he should denounce him as still worse.

Mr. C. said he was for getting all the information on the subject that the Senator from Massachusetts required, and also that desired by the Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. Niles,) and, when that was done, if it should be found that the public officers were justly censurable, he would be ready to give them his condemnation. But justice, as well as humanity, forbade that he should condemn any man in advance, by inference or implication, from ex parte statements or charges.

Mr. WEBSTER said he undertook to endorse nothing but the respectability of the writer of the letter which he had read; and he believed there were fifty letters now in the city, confirming his statements, which he also believed to be true. But he now proposed an inquiry, that all doubt might be settled on all sides, and that it might be ascertained how such a state of facts existed, if they did exist. Mr. W. had characterized nothing. He had in this respect avoided the course of the Senator from Connecticut. But he believed there had been a clear breach of the statute on this subject, and he wanted to know whether there was any thing to justify it. He was not disposed to treat public officers with extreme delicacy: he had drawn his resolution hastily, but without intending any disrespect.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama replied that he had made no objection whatever to the inquiry. On the contrary, he stated distinctly that he was in favor of it; and if, when the facts were brought out, the public officers concerned should be found to be censurable, he would be ready to pronounce judgment on them. But the Senator from Massachusetts denied that he had charged these public officers by implication. It was true that the Senator did not undertake to charge them, on his personal knowledge, with having violated the laws, to the injury of the public creditors; but what did he do? He (the Senator) stated in his place that these things were said of them, and that he believed them to be true. Now Mr. C. asked the Senator from Massachusetts where was the propriety of making insinuations calculated so deeply to implicate the conduct of individuals on a mere resolution of inquiry? Did any Senator resist the adoption of the resolution? No one: for it was not usual to resist an inquiry, whether it related to the conduct of public officers or not. Then had he not a right to complain that when an inquiry was instituted, and before the individuals concerned had an opportunity of uttering a word of explanation or defence, the Senator came forward with implications of the most damning character against them, and endorsed them by representing the man who made them as a man of high character and respectability.

The Senator from Massachusetts might, as he said, have gone no farther than had been frequently done on such occasions; but if such was the custom in the Senate, it was a bad one, and the sooner it was abolished the better it would be for its dignity and respectability.

Mr. HUBBARD offered a substitute for the former part of Mr. WEBSTER's resolution, which Mr. WEBSTER objected to as too general, and which, at the request of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, Mr. HUBBARD withdrew.

The amendment of Mr. NILES was then modified, to read as follows:

"And that he further report to the Senate, whether the late Bank of the United States has yet paid, or accounted with the Government, the sum of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, unjustly detained, on a pretence of a claim of damages for the non-payment of the draft drawn on the French Government, and also to report what loss the United States have sustained by depositing the public revenues in banks, or by receiving the notes of banks which have failed, or their bills become depreciated."

In this shape it was agreed to, and the resolution of Mr. WEBSTER, as amended by Mr. NILES, was adopted.

After its adoption, Mr. BAYARD said that the Secretary of the Senate was in doubt whether the word unjustly had been retained or stricken out of the resolution just adopted.

The CHAIR said that the motion to strike out had not been put, but that motion could now be put, by leave of the Senate.

Mr. NILES said he had not withdrawn the word unjustly, but would not delay the Senate by taking a vote on it, and as the resolution had passed, he would consider the word withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. LYON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the purpose of making the same provision for the officers and soldiers of the army, that is made for the officers and marines of the naval service, by an act, entitled "An act for the more equitable administration of the Navy Pension fund," approved March 3d, 1837.

SUB-TREASURY.

Mr. NORVELL said, that yesterday he had voted with the majority to make the Divorce bill the order of the day for that day two weeks. Upon reflection, he thought that the postponement was too long. Great anxiety seemed to prevail, not only here, but elsewhere, for the early consideration of this great measure. He had observed letters from New York, published in the morning papers, stating that the mercantile community were at a stand, unable or unwilling to go on with the transaction of their regular business operations, because of the delay on the part of Congress in acting definitively on this currency question. It appeared to him very evident, too, from the debate which had just taken place upon a resolution of inquiry, directed to the Secretary of the Treasury, that the sooner this connection between Bank and State could be brought to an issue, the better it would be for all parties. He therefore moved a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday, with a view further to make a motion that the Divorce bill be made the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

After a few remarks from Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. WRIGHT, the question was taken, and the reconsideration was ordered—ayes 21, noes 17.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL,

The bill was then made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. RIVES, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the necessary examinations and surveys for the establishment of a naval rendezvous and depot near the southern extremity of Florida; which was read twice, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to take up the bill reported by him the other day for the maintenance of our neutral relations on the inland frontier; which, after some remarks from Messrs. WALKER and BUCHANAN, was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, after some remarks, submitted an amendment, which, on an explanation from Mr. BUCHANAN, that the case was already provided for in the existing laws, he withdrew.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills were then severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of certain persons therein named.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Ferguson.

The bill for the relief of John McCarty.

The bill for the relief of Mrs. Caroline E. Clitherall, widow of Dr. George C. Clitherall, late a surgeon in the army of the United States.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. ADAMS on the 18th ult.:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a copy and translation of the pamhlet in the Spanish language, stated in the report of the Secretary of State o this House to have been printed and circulated by the late minister from the Republic of Mexico, Gorostiza, before his departure from this country, and the name of the diplomatic functionary from a foreign Government who communicated a copy of said pamphlet to the Secretary of State.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HOWARD to strike out all that part relating to the name of the diplomatic functionary, after the word "country," in the eighth line.

Mr CUSHING, who was entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks He said he wished to make an explanation to the House, in relation to a portion of his remarks when he had previously spoken on that subject. It was with reference to an implied charge that Mr. Fox, the British minister, was the individual who had communicated the pamphlet of Mr. Gorostiza to the Secretary. Of course, said Mr. C. that minister did not consider it incumbent upon him to notice the affair, so long as the imputation rested on mere newspaper statement; but when it was repeated on the floor of that House, in debate, Mr. Fox considered it necessary to make a declaration on the subject. From that communication, Mr. C. was enabled to state that Mr. Fox had no connection whatever with the history of the pamphlet of Mr. Gorostiza; that he was not the individual who presented the pamphlet to the Secretary of State; that he did not communicate to the Secretary the intelligence of the existence of such a pamphlet, nor did he make use of the expressions which had been the subject of debate in the House.

Mr. C. said it gave him great pleasure to be able to make that statement, for two reasons: first, that all imputation was thus removed from the representative of a foreign power; and, secondly, that, as hitherto suspicion had rested upon the whole of the diplomatic body, a great step had been taken towards ascertaining the real individual; for by thus ascertaining who it was not, was a beginning towards discovering who it was; and he was glad to see the fog begin to lift away from this singular affair.

Mr. C. explained further, that when, in his former speech, he had alluded to the pamphlet, he had left it to be supposed by the House that it had been published, and might be obtained from any of the booksellers. He now deemed it proper to state, that the copy which he had read was loaned to him by a friend; but wishing to procure a copy for himself, he applied to the booksellers, and was by them informed that the pamphlet had not been published, and was not for sale.

Mr. C. then adverted to a publication which purported to be a review of the pamphlet of Mr. Gorostiza, and which only professed to give a translation of the introductory portion of the pamphlet, and sundry extracts from the body of the work. From this, and from the report of Mr. Forsyth himself, it was evident that the entire pamphlet, with the various documents, had not been translated. Mr. C. here read that portion of the report of the Secretary of State referring to it, and contended that it was highly important that the House should be placed in possession of the original papers in Spanish, that they might have an opportunity of judging for themselves. That the entire pamphlet had never been published in its; popular sense, was confirmed beyond all doubt and this formed a conclusive reason why it should be obtained by the House, in order to judge if a proper construction had been put upon the various points, which often depended upon the turn or idiomatic expression of the language from which they were translated. Mr. C. said, that in making this remark, he did not mean to impeach the good faith or intelligence of Mr. Greenhow, the translator of the Department of State, whom he highly respected; but only to assert a general principle. Beside which, the fact that the pamphlet had not been published here (in the popular sense) by Mr. Gorostiza, was material to the question of the bearing of the transaction upon the relations of the United States with the Mexican Republic.

Mr. C. observed that the hour having expired, he would defer his remarks on the main question.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, containing a statement of the contracts, routes, &c. of the Express mail.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,

Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Mississippi election case, the questions pending being as follows:

Mr. BRONSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to their seats in the House as such.

The question pending being on the motion of Mr. BELL, who on yesterday moved to amend by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows: "That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material to a correct decision of the question presented, and the same is hereby rescinded."

Resolved further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Mississippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such;

Mr. PRENTISS addressed the House at length against the sitting members; and, without concluding, gave way to

Mr. CHAMBERS, on whose motion

The House adjourned.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill to settle contested claims that have arisen under the pre-emption laws, reported the same with an amendment, striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting a substitute designating what classes of claims shall be allowed.

The Senate took up the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, on the memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in relation to the Osage Indians; and after some conversation between Messrs LINN and SEVIER, it was, on motion of the former, laid on the table, with an understanding to take it up to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, the bill supplementary to the act to provide for the adjustment of titles to lots in the town of Detroit.

Mr. WALKER, from the same committee, to which had been referred the memorial praying for the creation of a board to settle certain titles to land in Wisconsin, moved to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, inasmuch as the power already existed by law in the receivers of the land offices to adjust those titles: the motion was agreed to.

The bill to amend the act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned, approved the 20th April, 1818, was read the read time and passed.

Mr. PRESTON made some few remarks in relation to the question which had been taken the previous day to reconsider the vote, making the Sub-Treasury bill the order of the day for Tuesday fortnight. He felt much surprised to find, on coming to the Senate this morning, that such a course had been pursued; the vote on the occasion was less in number than the original vote, and he therefore expressed a hope that some action might be had, by which the time could be fixed for Tuesday fortnight, as previously agreed on. If in order, he would therefore move to rescind the vote.

[A long and animated discussion here took place on a point of order, in which Messrs. KING, WALKER, RIVES, CLAY, CALHOUN, CRITTENDEN, WRIGHT, BROWN, and others participated.]

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky expressed his regret that the vote for reconsideration should have taken place on yesterday. Here was a bill with twenty-nine or thirty sections, pregnant with interest to the people, which had not yet been printed and spread upon our tables, yet we were to be precipitated into action, (when three days out of the six had already expired,) on a measure more odious in itself than the far-famed alien and sedition laws. Why, asked Mr. C. was it pressed here? Why was the measure not brought forward in the popular branch, to which it properly belongs? Mr. C. hoped the time, as originally fixed, would be restored.

Mr. WRIGHT replied to Mr. CLAY, saying that the charge of precipitancy came with a bad grace from the gentleman, who, on a former occasion, had taunted the committee for not bringing forward the measure at an earlier period.

Mr. CALHOUN was decidedly opposed to any delay; it was all-important to the commercial interest of the country that the measure should be decided on at once. He thought it better to fix the first early day for the consideration of this very important bill, when the chairman of the Committee on Finance could make his explanations and suggestions; that, in his opinion, would be the best mode of proceeding. If gentlemen at that time did not find themselves prepared to go on with the discussion, he, for one, would be disposed to grant it; but would govern himself as the exigency of the case might require.

Mr. ROANE said, from a desire to extend any possible courtesy to those who asked for a longer time for consideration on this all important matter, he would, as he had voted with the majority yesterday for a reconsideration, move to reconsider that vote.

The discussion having been continued for some time,

Mr. WALKER moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky called for the ayes and noes, which were ordered; when there appeared for the motion 19, against it 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wright and Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster and White—27.

Mr. CALHOUN still pressed an early consideration of the bill: southern interests were already suffering.

Mr. CRITTENDEN opposed the measure.

Mr. RIVES thought the delay of a few days could be a matter of no consequence to the commercial interests of the country, but would be of vast importance to Senators. He thought the time before fixed on would have a tendency to accelerate rather than retard the public business; by that period every Senator could digest the subject, and prepare his mind for prompt action. Here was a bill which the committee had been six or seven weeks in preparing, and when seven or eight days were asked, to prepare to meet the measure, gentlemen were disposed to deny us even that time. Was there any thing unreasonable in asking such a postponement? If it had taken seven weeks to prepare this bill, with all the aid and stimulus of the Senator from South Carolina to help it on, should we, who were opposed to the measure, be denied a few days? He trusted not.

Mr. BROWN spoke at length against the motion to reconsider. He thought the sooner a decisive and prompt action was had on the subject, the better for the interests of the people and the Government. He did not know how gentlemen could reconcile the inconsistency of their conduct in relation to the matter. When the friends of the Administration were desirous of bringing it forward, they were charged with a disposition to force it upon the consideration of the Senate at an early and improper period. When they were preparing and arranging its details, they were charged with dilatoriness, and taunted with a wish to surrender the question. It had been said, in and out of the House, that we did not intend to carry through the measure; that it was a mere ad captandum, gotten up for political effect. He, (Mr. B.) as one of its friends, was willing to give an earnest of his desire to prosecute it to a complete fulfilment. Never did any thing come with a worse grace than these complaints from the source they do. In a discussion which took place in this body some weeks since, it was asked, and sneeringly asked, "Why did not the Committee on Finance bring forward their Sub-Treasury scheme, instead of a picayune bill for this ten miles square?" And when the commercial and other interests of this great country were requiring that Congress should act promptly on this matter, we are told that we are endeavoring "to force upon them a system more odious than the alien and sedition law itself." Sir, (said Mr. B.) this system, thus denounced by the friends of a paper currency, was the system of the framers of the Constitution, and wiser and better men never lived. Banks were never contemplated by the fathers of the Constitution as agents of Government, and experience had shown us that the Government should not again put it in their power to embarrass its operations. Mr. B. thought we were bound by every consideration not to delay the subject any longer, and he trusted the motion would not prevail.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider the vote of yesterday, and carried by a vote of 23 to 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roan, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—23.

NAYS—Messrs Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wright, and Young—20.

The question to reconsider the vote of yesterday being carried, the question was then taken on fixing the day for making this bill the special order, when Tuesday week was agreed on by vote of 23 to 20.

The CHAIR communicated a report received from the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, showing the amount of specie received at the land offices, &c. which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The bill for the relief of the executrix of Richard W. Meade then came up on its third reading, when

Mr. WRIGHT rose and addressed the Senate until a late hour against the bill. He regretted that he felt it a paramount duty to resist it, from considerations of justice to the country and his own conscience. He entered into a succinct history of this case from the time of Mr. Meade's visit to Cadiz in 1803, up to the period when the claim was made on this country, under the provisions of the treaty with Spain, from which he maintained that Mr. Meade had no well-founded claim on the United States, but that the claim was between himself and the Government of Spain, growing out of transactions of a private nature The bill, in its present shape, it was true, appropriated nothing; but it nevertheless delegated the important powers of Congress to three individuals, which course, he conceived, whatever might be the virtues and acquirements of the gentlemen, (and he did not believe three better could be found,) was dangerous in itself, and wrong in principle. Even if the commission to whom it was proposed to refer it should decide against the claim, still the passage of the bill by the Senate might be looked on hereafter as a solemn recognition of the justice of the claim.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the further consideration of this bill was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, introduced a bill to authorize the location of pre-emption certificates by the register of the land office at Batesville, Arkansas, under act of 26th May, 1834: read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and soon after

The Senate adjourned.

CANADA AFFAIRS.

Mr. FILLMORE asked the consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Mississippi election case, the questions pending being as follows:

Mr. BRONSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to their seats in the House us such.

The question pending being on the motion of Mr. BELL, who on yesterday moved to amend by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows: "That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material to a correct decision of the question presented, and the same is hereby rescinded."

Resolved further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Misssippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such;

Mr. PRENTISS, one of the contestants, concluded his remarks, and he was followed, very briefly, by Mr. GHOLSON, and by Mr. FOSTER, of New York, at some length; when, without concluding, the last gentleman gave way to

Mr. HOLSEY, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, January 19, 1837.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a petition of McKee, Harding and Co. and 190 citizens of Wheeling, Virginia, praying Congress to authorize a subscription on the part of the General Government to the stock of the Jeffersonville and New Albany Canal Company.

Mr. SMITH said he had received the petition yesterday at too late a period to present it. The petitioners include almost the entire business portion of the citizens of Wheeling, as he understands. They represent the object of the petition to be, to enlist Congress in aid of the construction of a canal around the falls of Ohio, on the Indiana side, of sufficient capacity to pass steamboats of the largest size at all seasons of the year A charter had been granted to the company by the Legislature of Indiana. The work, he said, was one of great national importance, and he hoped and believed it would receive from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which he proposed to refer it, all the consideration its importance entitled it to. It was one only of a number of petitions emanating from different places on the Ohio, that would be presented to Congress on this subject; and as it was a subject of mere than ordinary importance, he asked that the petition might be printed, which was ordered accordingly, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Portland, Maine, praying an appropriation for the erection of a beacon on St. George's shoal, in the entrance of that harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Philadelphia praying that the frigate Raritan, now on the stocks, might be completed; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr NORVELL presented a petition from a number of Mechanics and other inhabitants of the city of Philadelphia, praying that Congress should make an appropriation for the completion of the construction of the frigate Raritan, now on the stocks in that city, as soon as practicable: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Seward Porter; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury furnish to the Senate a list of all articles of merchandise of import subject to duties and the rate of said duties; also, a list of all articles of import admitted free of duty.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of all persons and corporations appointed pension agents, under act of the 20th April, 1836, or under any other authority; and communicate copies of all orders and regulations prescribed to such agents.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana offered the following resolution, which lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the State of Indiana the pre-emption right to the lands obtained by the late treaty with the Miami Indians, in that State, on such terms and at such price as shall be just, to aid the State in her works of internal improvement.

The reports of the Committee on Pensions adverse to the petitions of Robert Mann, John Howe, Benjamin Bancroft, Isaac Bates, Catharine Painter, Anne E. Crittenden, and sundry others, were severally considered and concurred in.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, moved to discharge that committee from the further consideration of the petition of Elisha Sutton, and to refer it to the Committee on Pensions. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. N. also moved a recommitment of the report on the petition of William and Henry Fulford, with additional documents, which he presented to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of the executrix of the late Richard W. Meade then came up as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. WALKER addressed the Senate for some time, with much zeal, in favor of the claim, and chiefly in answer to the remarks of Mr. Wright of yesterday. He maintained that the claim was founded in justice, and not to meet it would be a violation of every principle of justice; a violation of the solemn treaty with Spain, which released that Government from all debts due to our citizens.

Mr. NILES said he had supported the bill on another occasion, and felt still disposed to do so, if it were modified to suit his views. He thought it would be better to so amend it, that a board might report all the facts in the case, and its opinion in relation to the whole subject, when the Senate would be better prepared to act definitely. Mr. N. therefore moved an amendment, to the effect that the board created by the first section of the bill shall report the facts of the case, and the principles applicable to such facts; and whether, in their opinion, any thing was due, and what sum of the original claim of said Meade against Spain; and whether, in law or equity, the United States was bound to pay said claim to the heirs of R. W. Meade.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky wished that the Senator would withdraw his amendment. He thought it calculated to produce delay, and to embarrass the final passage of the bill. There was no danger, as had been remarked before, about other claims growing out of the passage of this act. The claim of the Meades stood isolated and alone. [Here Mr. C. went into a long detail of all the circumstances connected with the case, contending for the justice of the claim, and the injury the family of the Meades had sustained by the long delay of the Government to do them justice.]

Mr. HUBBARD moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to amend it, by striking out the second section, and substituting that offered by the Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. Niles.)

Mr. BUCHANAN was of opinion that the best course would be to pass the bill in its present shape. Congress had already spent more time in the discussion of this subject than would pay the claim (large as it was) twice over. He would undertake to say that the claim might be examined, item by item, by every Senator, and that no more would be known when they were done than when they began, and that the opinions of no two Senators would be alike on its merits. He thought no better mode could be adopted than that of reference to a board of three commissioners; and those named here were as competent as any under the Government, and, in fact, there was no other way of getting rid of it.

Mr. HUBBARD was opposed to the claim in all its features: he did not believe in its justice; but if it were correct, by adopting the amendment, he should then have a distinct opinion expressed, which would in truth expedite its liquidation rather than retard it. And besides, we should not delegate the powers of Congress to individuals; he was opposed in principle to any such proceeding.

Mr. WALKER hoped the motion would not prevail; it was the same in substance, though not in language, with the one offered by the Senator from New Hampshire on another occasion, and lost. It was not possible for any board to examine the case, and report on it, in time for the action of Congress this session. There were over three thousand documents to be examined, and the whole transactions in the case exceeded four millions of dollars, being from 1807 to 1814. Can any Senator believe it possible to do so? The thing was impossible! He would undertake to say, that if that course were pursued, the youngest child of the Meades would not be living to see it perfected. Why did the Senator object to the reference? If he were satisfied to vote on the opinion of a board, expressed in favor of the claim, why not on their final decision on the claim itself.

Mr. HUBBARD replied, that though he had entire confididence in the individual's named, yet it would be involving principles which he was not disposed to sanction.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, made some few observations in favor of recommitting the bill. He had not had sufficient light to enable him to vote on the bill understandingly.

The question was then put on Mr. HUBBARD'S motion to recommit.

Mr. WALKER asked for the yeas and nays, when there appeard for the motion 17, against it 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Williams, Wright, and Young—17.

NAYS—Allen, Bayard, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, and Walker—24.

The question then recurring on the passage of the bill—

Mr. WALKER asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WRIGHT offered a few observations not distinctly heard.

The question being put, was carried by a vote of 23 to 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmade, and Walker—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Morris, Pierce, Robbins, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Williams, Wright, and Young—16.

The Senate then adjourned till Monday.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked, that when this subject was under the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Affairs two or three years ago, two statements were prepared, one in favor of the claim and the other against it, and Mr. C. suggested that both these statements be printed.

Mr. HOWARD replied that they were included in the documents accompanying the present report, as were all the reports made on former occasions.

Mr. CUSHING remarked that the subject of this report interested a large number of persons, and as it was not long, he would ask for its reading, which was ordered.

The bill having been twice, was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and two thousand extra copies of the report and documents ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUSHING called up the resolution reported by him on the 12th inst. from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, requesting the President of the United States to consider the propriety of entering into negotiations with the court of Denmark, for the purpose of obtaining therefrom a just and equitable indemnification for the value of two prizes taken by Com. Paul Jones.

[As explained by Mr. HOWARD, these were two British vessels captured by Com. Jones, in 1797, taken to Denmark, and released by the Danish Government on the application of the British, Minister, on the ground that the United States were not then an independent Government.]

Mr. TALIAFERRO wished the subject postponed till to-morrow, to enable him to prepare a more definite proposition for the recovery of this claim, the justice of which had once been admitted by the Government of Denmark, and a sum of money tendered, but refused. He was opposed to leaving it to the discretion of any body, but suggested a modification requesting the President to cause to be carried out the resolution of the Continental Congress on the subject, by opening an immediate negotiation therefor.

Mr. CUSHING replied in support of the resolution, and in opposition to the proposed modification. He contended that the Continental Congress, from which emanated the first resolutions on the subject, was an Executive Congress, whereas the present Congress was not; therefore, it would be improper to re-adopt those resolutions, because the present Congress possessed no powers to compel any action on the part of the President; but could only make suggestions and recommendations Mr. C. recapitulated the facts of the case, and explained that the Government of Denmark had given up the prizes to the British, on the ground that they had been taken piratically, and that the thirteen colonies of America were in a state of rebellion at the time.

Mr. C's remarks were arrested by the expiration of the morning hour.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The House resumed the report of the Committee of Elections, with the motion of Mr. BRONSON, and the amendment proposed by Mr. BELL.

Mr. FOSTER resumed his remarks from yesterday, and spoke at great length in reply to Mr. Prentiss; and, after speaking for upwards of two hours, gave way to Mr. DE GRAFF, on whose motion, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, Jan. 22, 1838.

CHEROKEE MEMORIAL.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House take up the memorial of a Delegation of the Cherokee nation, remonstrating against the treaty of New Echota of December, 1835, presented by him on Monday last, and lying over.

Mr. E. explained that he did not desire to debate it, but merely to move its reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. OWENS objected to the memorial being taken up, and called for the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired whether it would not be in order for the gentleman to submit his motion when the State of Vermont should be called for petitions?

The CHAIR replied that it was equally in order now.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired further whether the memorial would not come up as a matter of course when that State was called, having been presented by a gentleman therefrom?

The CHAIR replied that it would not under the new rules.

The House determined to consider the memorial—yeas 86, nays 83.

Mr. EVERETT then moved to refer the memorial to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with instructions "to report the facts in the case."

Mr. HAYNES moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. EVERETT called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered.

Mr. WISE inquired if it would be in order to call for the reading of the memorial.

The CHAIR replied that it would not, on a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. WISE wished to know how the House could vote understandingly on a subject it had never heard read?

The CHAIR said the question had been so decided by his predecessor, and assented to by the House.

Mr. OWENS informed the gentleman from Virginia that the memorial, and all the accompanying papers, had been printed under the order of the House, and laid on the tables of the members.

The motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative—yeas 93, nays 94, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bruyn, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Timothy J. Carter, Casey, Chapman, Cilley, Coles, Craig, Crary, Cushman, De Graff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Farrington, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Gholson, Glascock, Gray, Griffin, Hammond, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Howard, Hubley, William H. Hunter, Ingham, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Lawler, Lewis, Logan, Lyon, James M. Mason, Martin, May, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKim, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Muhlenberg, Owens, Parker, Parmenter, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petriken, Phelps, Pickens, Plumer, Pratt, Prentiss, Reily, Rencher, Richardson, Rives, Sheffer, Sheplor, Spencer, Stewart, Stone, Taylor, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Weeks, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Boyd, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, William B. Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clowney, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davee, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Goode, William Graham, Grennell, Hall, Halstead, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Henry Johnson, W. C. Johnson, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Loomis, Mallory, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maxwell, McKennan, Mercer, Mathias Morris, Calvary Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Ramsey, Russell, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Sibley, Smith, Southgate, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Webster, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Yorke—94.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table, and the question recurring on Mr. EVERETT'S motion to commit with the instruction.

Mr. HAYNES rose, and said that if they were to have a Cherokee war, he believed it was as well to have it then as at any other stage of the proceedings, and he therefore moved the indefinite postponement of the whole subject.

Mr. EVERETT was unwilling to go into a discussion of this matter before the facts of the case were reported upon; but if we must have a discussion at this time, he would take occasion to make a few remarks at present in relation to this memorial. He considered it a question of very great magnitude, of perhaps as great magnitude as any which would present itself to the consideration of the House at the present session, and he was surprised to find that motions should be made to lay it upon the table for the purpose of preventing a hearing of these petitioners. The question was of importance, not only so far as it related to the rights of the Cherokees, but so far as it related to the character of the American Government. There were many things which recommended the memorialists to the favorable consideration of the House. This tribe has at all times been friendly to the United States, and he was gratified to see it stated, in a speech of an officer of the Government, that they had stood side by side with us heretofore, fighting for the common cause of liberty; and on this ground he looked upon them as being entitled to the consideration of the House and the nation. It was also to be recollected that these people had arrived at a high state of civilization, as nearly as much so as those of our inhabitants in that vicinity. This treaty, then, which they complain of, when carried into force, proposes to remove them from their homes which have been improved and made comfortable, and send them into the wilderness to seek new abodes. This seemed to be doing them injustice, and of all the various species of injustice, that is most intolerable which cloaks itself under legal forms. There might be great injustice done to these people from other causes, but they were as nothing compared with this which they now complain of. We to be sure have a treaty, and that treaty has been ratified by the Senate, but they assert that this treaty was not the act of the nation, and they ask this House to inquire into the facts of the case. They state that their nation consists of about eighteen thousand persons, while the treaty was made by about eighty, and that this eighty were unauthorized by the nation. Now the Government had evidence of a treaty being made, but as it was not made by the Cherokee nation, as these memorialists represented, he would ask whether it would be expedient to plunge the country in a war, for the purpose of carrying it into effect. At any rate, he trusted the House would not refuse to consider this memorial, and inquire into the facts set forth by the memorialists.

The CHAIR here announced that the hour had arrived for proceeding to the special order of the day.

Mr. HOPKINS gave notice of a motion to reconsider the vote refusing to lay the subject on the table.

The CHAIR having entertained the motion by directing its entry on the journal,

Mr. MERCER raised the point of order, that the motion could not intervene in the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont, and insisted upon the entry of his objection on the journal.

The subject was then ordered to lie over, the special order coming up.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Mississippi election case, the question being on the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. BRONSON of New York:

Resolved, That Sergeant S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to seats in this House as such.

And the amendment of Mr. BELL to strike out all after the word "resolved," and to insert one to the following effect, viz: that the resolution of the House of the 3d of October last, declaring that Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material in the case, and the same is hereby rescinded. And

Resolved, further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Mississippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such.

Mr. FOSTER resumed his remarks in support of the sitting members, in opposition to the contestants, and in reply to Mr. Prentiss, one of the latter. Without concluding, Mr. F. gave way to

Mr. BRONSON, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the memorial of Mr. Feuchtwanger, of Philadelphia, praying Congress to substitute the German silver, of his invention, for the copper coin of the United States, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the report of the director of the Mint on the subject be printed; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred the memorial of Gen. Thomas Sumpter of South Carolina, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LUMPKIN said, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a communication from the War Department has been made, and has been lying on your table for a week or more past, furnishing copies of the correspondence held with that Department in connection with the subject of the execution of the Cherokee treaty of 1835.

Mr. TIPTON inquired if the document which the Senator referred to was the memorial of John Ross and others, presented at the last session, and laid on the table.

Mr. LUMPKIN replied that it was not, and again explained the nature of the document.

My object (continued Mr. L.) in rising at this time, is to ask for the printing of the communication referred to, together with the accompanying correspondence. Although I have not had an opportunity of examining fully what has been communicated upon this subject, I take it for granted that the requirements of the resolution have been complied with; and if so, I deem it important that the Senate and the country should, without delay, be put in possession of the information communicated. The importance which I attach to having this information diffused, arises from the consideration that it will tend effectually to disabuse the minds of those who labor under the misapprehension which has been created by Mr. John Ross and his associates in regard to the validity of the treaty referred to.

While Mr. Ross continues to protest against the validity of the treaty, and is remonstrating to every department of the Government against its execution, this communication will show that the Government not only considers the treaty the supreme law of the land, but has steadily progressed in its execution, and that the treaty has actually, to a very great extent, been already executed. That much, very much, has been done towards the execution of the treaty, which cannot be undone.

With me, sir, the present condition of the Cherokee people is a subject of great solicitude. In whatever light I may be viewed here or elsewhere in regard to my feelings and policy towards this people, I am conscious that the day will come, and is not now far distant, when my course of policy towards these people, from first to last, will receive the general approbation of all those who are well informed on the subject. At this moment, sir, nothing hinders the consummation of this treaty with the Cherokee people, which would make them not only comfortable, but place within their reach the means of making them the most independent and best provided for people of any community in these United States, but the opposition of Mr. John Ross and his associates, aided as they are by many influential and talented individuals, whom I am forced to believe are laboring under great misapprehension, in regard to the true state and condition of these people, and the impending dangers which are threatening them at the present moment.

This treaty, sir, has been made and ratified according to the forms of our Constitution. It was negotiated with a delegation of the Cherokee people, who, in point of intelligence, patriotism, education, morality and probity of character, will not only bear a fair comparison with Mr. Ross and his delegation, now perhaps in the hearing of my voice, but they would gain by a comparison with any delegation of the aboriginal race who have ever negotiated and signed a treaty with the United States.

I have seen, and read, sir, Mr. Ross's memorial, and its appendages, to the present Congress, which has been printed by the other branch of Congress, and laid upon our tables. In that memorial, he greatly derogates from the character, and impugns the motives, of the individuals who negotiated and signed the treaty of 1835. And that document being printed and circulated by order of one branch of Congress, I will now notify the Senate that I have in my possession a document, written by Mr. Elias Boudinot, late Editor of the Cherokee Phœnix, and one of the principal agents who negotiated and signed the late treaty of 1835, in the nature of a reply to the various allegations contained in the writings of Mr. Ross herein referred to. Mr. Boudinot is a man of education, refinement, probity, and high moral sense and character, and has at all times been the able and efficient advocate and defender of the rights of his people. He has been with them in their six troubles, and is not disposed to forsake them in their seventh. If left to his guidance, he would gently lead them out of all the difficulties by which they are now surrounded, and plant them in a land of excellent promise. Mr. Boudinot is not only a nominal Cherokee; he is identified by blood and feeling with these people, having but little mixture of the white blood in his veins.

The propriety of printing the communication, and reply to which I have adverted, arises from the fact, that the Cherokee people are kept in a state of delusion and misapprehension in regard to their present condition. They unfortunately believe that Mr. Ross is here, doing something to abrogate or overturn the late treaty, and no doubt many of them believe that no valid treaty has been made. This is a ruinous delusion to these unfortunate people, for the time is now drawing to a close when they must take their departure for their new homes in the West. The time stipulated for their final departure is in May next; and when the time arrives, go they must: no power can obrogate or overturn this treaty. And these people, instead of being kept back by the operations of Mr. Ross, ought to yield to the advice of better friends, who stand ready to take them by the hand, and lead them forth to their promised land of rest, where I trust these unfortunate people will cease to be troubled by the white population. Payments have been made under the provisions of this treaty to a very large amount. Nine-tenths of the most intelligent and wealthy Cherokees have availed themselves of the advantageous and liberal provisions of the treaty, and have become recipients under its provisions, and have and are going to the West. The only difficulty is with the ignorant and deluded, who are still looking to the operations of Mr. Ross and his delegation, who, I understand, still remain here, and I am informed are writing letters home that their prospects are encouraging. Now, every one here very well knows that this treaty will be executed; bnt these unfortunate Cherokees are still deluded through the channel pointed out.

Mr. TIPTON now understood the document to which the Senator from Georgia alluded, and he was highly in favor of printing it. Not understanding at first what the document was that the Senator wished to print, he was under the impression that it was the memorial of John Ross, whose conduct in staying in this city, and writing home letters to his people, to induce them to oppose obstacles in the way of the execution of the treaty, was producing the most injurious effects, not only to the Cherokees themselves, but to the Government. As this treaty had been executed almost entirely, with the exception only of so far as related to that small portion of the tribe yet adhering to John Ross, he thought it highly desirable that the documents should be published, that the country might properly appreciate its beneficial tendencies—that the pernicious counsels of John Ross might be counteracted, and that it might be shown to the world at large that the Government was resolutely determined, mildly, but firmly, to carry out with this people its benevolent policy of removing them from their present dangerous situation, without which it is impossible the race can be preserved.

The question then being taken on printing 500 extra copies of the communication from the War Department, it was agreed to.

Mr. LUMPKIN then offered the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

WHEREAS, A memorial, acccompanied by various other documents, of a delegation of the Cherokee nation of Indians, remonstrating against the validity of the Cherokee treaty of 1835, has been printed by order of the House of Representatives; and whereas said memorial and documents not only call in question the validity of said treaty, but greatly derogate from the character, and impugn the motives, of those individuals of the Cherokee nation who negotiated and signed said treaty on the part of the nation:

And whereas, Elias Boudinot, late editor of the Cherokee Phenix, and one of the principal agents of the Cherokee nation, who negotiated and signed said treaty, has written a reply to the various allegations set forth in the memorial referred to: therefore be it

Resolved, That fifteen hundred copies of the reply of Mr. Boudinot referred to be published for the use of the Senate.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of Samuel Potter, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REGULATION OF STEAMBOATS.

The bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, being taken up—

The chairman having explained the amendments suggested by the committee, they were severally concurred in. The amendments were to strike out all in the fifth section, relating to testing the strength and soundness of the boilers, by the application of a hydraulic pressure equal to three times the pressure boilers were allowed to carry.

In the sixth section, striking out all relating to the same, as in the preceding section.

The seventh section was also so amended as to strike out that part which related to keeping the engine in motion sufficient to work the pump, and give the necessary supply of water, to keep the steam down to what it was when the boat was under head-way.

The eighth section was so amended as to compel all boats over two hundred tons to carry not less than three long boats or yawls capable of carrying twenty persons each—

The tenth section was stricken out, which compelled a descending boat to shut off steam when within one half mile of an ascending boat, and permitting the boat to float upon the current until the ascending boat passed.

Mr. SEVIER thought the 11th section, relating to the lights, might be dispensed with also. He was of opinion that the lights, as contemplated by the bill, would have no other effect than to blind and bewilder the pilot.

Mr. CLAYTON was opposed to striking out the section. He thoughts the lights, as designated, would occasion no inconvenience to the pilots, and that little expense would be incurred in fixing lights that would not in any manner interfere with the vision of those entrusted with the navigation.

Mr. SEVIER explained that the necessary lights were all over the boat, and that there was no difficulty in descrying the boat from the fires of the furnaces, and lights from the decks and berths.

Mr. BAYARD thought if lights were required by law, that there ought to be two at least.

Mr. STRANGE thought it better to leave the matter to experienced men, who would, no doubt, take all the necessary precautions for the safety of boat and passengers. He thought the last section covered all the ground necessary on the occasion, which made misconduct, negligence, or inattention, on the part of the captain, engineer, or pilot, penal.

Mr. DAVIS moved to amend the 11th section by inserting that "boats running between sunset and sunrise, should carry one or more signal lights that might be seen by boats navigating the same routes; which amendment was adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he rose to inquire of the chairman of the committee, whether the bill, with the modifications and amendments just proposed and accepted by the chairman, contained any provision against racing with steamboats, or any provision requiring an examination of the pilots and engineers employed on the boats. He (Mr. S.) had not been able to ascertain, owing, he supposed, to his not having been able to hear the amendments which had been accepted as modifications of the bill by the chairman, whether the bill did or did not, as amended, contain these provisions. He thought it ought to contain them. He believed much of its desired utility would be lost, unless some provisions on these points were incorporated in the bill. He would not, however, anticipate the reply of the honorable chairman to his interrogatories.

Mr. GRUNDY (the chairman) said the committee had considered the proposition to require an examination of the engineers and pilots employed on boats; and although they believed the object to be desirable, they had foreseen so much difficulty in carrying it into effect, that they had abandoned it at this time, believing that it would retard the operations of the bill, but that it might be resorted to with advantage hereafter. As to the other inquiry of the Senator, he (Mr. G.) thought it provided for in the fifteenth section of the bill, which was the only provision on the subject.

Mr. SMITH said he had seen the section of the bill which the Senator supposes meets the case to which the injury was directed. The Senator was certainly mistaken in the object and legal operation of that section. He (Mr. S.) would read it to show that it did not embrace the case. [Mr. S. then read the 13th section of the bill.] It appears clear from this section, said Mr. S. that it only punishes the offence in cases where life is lost by the negligence or misconduct of the captain, pilot, engineer, or other person employed in navigating the boat. This provision does not cover the offence he wished to punish. He wished to punish the offence of steamboat racing, whether lives are lost or not. On the other portion of his inquiry, he still thought some provision of the kind important, as he was well satisfied that steamboat disasters frequently occur from the absolute ignorance and want of skill of those engaged as pilots and engineers. He was apprized that there might be some difficulty in carrying into effect this desirable object, yet he would not despair of drafting a section that would meet the object, should no other Senator feel disposed to do it, before the bill left the committee. On the other branch of the inquiry to which he had first alluded, he would in a moment draw an amendment, to come in at the close of the section he had read to the Senate.

Mr. S. then offered the following amendment: "And every such captain, engineer, or other person employed as aforesaid in navigating any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, who shall be guilty of racing with any other boat, on any pretext whatever, although no loss of life shall be occasioned thereby, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction, be fined in any sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars, nor less than one hundred dollars, at the discretion of the court."

Mr. BAYARD thought that the explosion should be considered prima facie evidence of negligence or inattention, and the burden of proof ought to be thrown on the persons concerned in the boat; otherwise conviction would never follow. All the officers would be linked together, and sustain each other.

Mr. SEVIER was of the opinion that it would be impossible to carry out the amendment. He thought the thirteenth section even went farther than was necessary. If life and property were endangered, that provision contained the remedy. It would be always difficult to determine what racing was. Boats left for their destination by dozens at a time, and that boat which was the fastest invariably got all the passengers. Persons wishing to travel on the western waters made it their business to inquire for the boat of the greatest velocity. Every one, in travelling, was anxious to get on with the least possibly delay; and he had been in boats where the passengers had entreated the captain not to let the other boats pass them.

Mr. CLAYTON was opposed to the amendment. It would, in his opinion, be difficult to determine when boats were racing. He had been in boats which were side by side, and, in other instances, not fifty yards distant, the whole trip; and though they might appear to be racing to casual observers, yet they were going only at their ordinary rate. He thought that it would be subjecting the masters and pilots of these boats to malicious prosecutions.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana begged the indulgence of the Senate but for a few moments, while he attempted to sustain his proposition, and to answer the objections of Senators who had spoken in opposition to it. He (Mr. S.) believed the amendment absolutely necessary, to give effect to the bill. The 13th section, to which his amendment was offered, provided only for cases where lives are destroyed. It punishes the offence after it has occurred, accompanied with the loss of life. After the injury is sustained, after the boat and passengers are blown up or sunk: it locks the door after the horse is stolen. There was such a thing, as he understood, as preventive justice, as well as the punishment of crimes after they had been committed. These distinctions run through the whole catalogue of offences known to our books. We have the different degrees of offences and crimes from the simple assault, to the killing with malice aforethought, in offences against the person. So in all other cases, we have, and we punish the different grades of criminal acts and misdemeanors; and it may well be said that justice is more certain in her aim and purpose in the punishment of the incipient stages of crime, than she is in the more aggravated; for as the punishment rises in the scale of consequences, the proofs become more difficult, and the punishment more uncertain.

He (Mr. S.) believed that racing was the incipient stage of the awful calamities with which the papers of the day are filled, occurring by steamboat disasters, produced by bursting of boilers, collapsing, contusions and contacts with other boats, snags, sawyers, and other solid substances. The papers were filled with these most awful calamities daily. The great dangers to which the travelling public were subjected at every point called aloud for the most efficient remedy as a preventive; and he hoped he would not be accused of hostility to the bill, or the section to which he had offered his amendment, when he said that he would rather be the means of saving the lives of the crew and passengers of one boat, than of punishing, by incarceration in the walls of a prison, all the surviving officers of boats that may be blown up in the world. His object was to save lives, not to punish survivors; and the surest way to do this was to punish the incipient offences before the final catastrophe occurred—to meet the offender at the threshold—to stop him at once—to say to him, you shall not endanger the lives of your crew and passengers—to meet him in limine—to prevent the commission of the offence for which he must suffer, under circumstances that could afford no consolation to the dead or dying.

The Senator from Delaware (Mr. Clayton) thinks the term racing is too uncertain in the first place to be defined and proved; and in the second place he objects to the amendment, because he says it will give rise to malicious prosecutions. To the first of these petitions he (Mr. S.) would say that the term was one of very general, and he believed well known, signification; and as to the proof, it was like all other facts, it would be proved in the ordinary way; and the fact whether the defendant be or be not guilty of racing, will be for the jury to determine. From all the circumstances of the case, he could see no great force in the objections of the Senator. The same difficulty will arise in every part of the bill. What is negligence, and the difficulty of proving it, will at once strike the Senator as equally affected by his remarks; and yet the bill could not define negligence more particularly than it had. These were facts to be left to the jury, who would determine what was and what was not negligence, from all the facts before them. So in the case of racing. He thought the objection of the Senator lies as well to one as the other. The Senator says that malicious prosecutions may occur under the amendment. He (Mr. S.) would say to the Senator that he had no such fears. He thought the great danger would be that too few prosecutions would take place. There would be the great difficulty. Passengers who escape uninjured, will not be willing enough to be delayed in their journey to attend a criminal prosecution. He would repeat, he believed that objection the least entitled to weight of any that could be urged, with due deference to the opinion of that learned Senator.

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. Sevier) says that the amendment will prevent boats from running at their best speed, and that it is the quality in a boat that she is the fastest boat in port that gets her the passengers. He (Mr. S.) would say to that Senator, that the term racing with other boats would not at all apply to the ordinary speed of a steamboat. Whether she be a fast or a slow boat, she has her speed; that speed is known by her ordinary trips, and by it she secures her passengers. The amendment is intended to apply to those races growing out of strife between the boats, where instantaneously the steam is pressed to its greatest power, to increase the velocity of the boat, reckless of the lives of the passengers. The Senator says that he came up the Ohio last fall in a boat with him, (Mr. S.) and that the passengers stimulated the captain to suffer no boat to pass her. This is very true, and what does it prove? Why, sir, the greater necessity for the amendment; for there are few persons who have travelled on either steamboats or stages, who do not know that in moments of excitement the feelings of rival and competing officers extend to the passengers on either side; and they, like the officers, become excited, take part with the competitor, and lose sight entirely of the safety of the boat, or stage and passengers, in their anxiety to prove victorious in the race. This was the very state of the case he wished to meet. He wished to put a stop to it at once. Let the officers know the penalty, and they will be very careful not to stimulate the passengers to join them in a reckless exposure of life and property. He believed he had answered the only objections he had heard to the amendment. He knew the difficulty of satisfying a committee that had drafted a bill, that it required amendment; and should he have failed, he would at least have the consolation of having proposed the amendment, and having his vote recorded in its favor. He would, therefore, ask for the ayes and noes.

The question was then taken by ayes and noes, and lost by a vote of 15 to 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, McKean, Niles, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence Strange, Tipton, and Williams—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, White, and Wright—21.

Mr. NORVELL then moved an amendment, compelling these boats to carry life preservers for each passenger. Mr. N. alluded to the calamitous case of the steam packet between Charleston and New York, and the number of lives lost that might have been saved, had this vessel been provided with these essentials. If the expense were objected to, the additional charge might be imposed on passengers.

Mr. RUGGLES made some observations in favor of the amendment of Mr. NORVELL, and suggested modifications, to which Mr. N. assented.

Mr. KING thought the whole matter impracticable. Here we were about to impose penalties for not furnishing life preservers for each and every passenger. How was it possible for the Captain to tell how many passengers he was to have? It was no uncommon thing for boats to stop and take way passengers for a few miles, and were these machines to be prepared for them also? or was the Captain to stop and ascertain his increase, and then go to a shop to procure them? He thought it infinitely better that every traveller should carry his own life preserver with him. He thought this feature would render the bill more objectionable than any other in it.

The question was taken on this amendment and lost.

Mr. NILES thought it essential to the bill that there should be a provision introduced making it obligatory on the runners of boats to have at least one skilful engineer. Mr. N. adverted to the danger that must ensue from the want of skilful and scientific officers of that description, and moved the following amendment, to come after the sixth section:

"And it shall be the duty of the owners and masters of steamboats, licensed in pursuance of the provisions of this act, to employ on board of their respective boats at least one skilful and experienced engineer; and in case of neglect to do so, the said owners and masters shall be held responsible for all damages to the property or any passengers on board of any boats, occasioned by an explosion of the boiler, or any derangement of the engine or machinery of said boat; and in case any life is lost from the same cause, the owners shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and on conviction be subject to the same punishment as provided in the last section of this act."

To this it was objected by the Chairman, that so many skilful engineers could not be had as was required; that the duties devolved on careful and experienced firemen, who were raised to that station as they were found worthy or efficient.

The question was taken on the adoption of this amendment, and carried by a vote of 14 to 12.

Mr. SEVIER thought the thirteenth section entirely too broad, inasmuch as it subjected to the penalties of the law all persons in said boat. The captain of the boat was entitled to obedience from all the subordinates, and would exact it. Would it, then, be reasonable to subject that class to the rigors of this act, many of whom were slaves hired in these boats?

The bill to provide for the security of passengers conveyed in vessels propelled in whole, or in part, by steam, was taken up; and after being debated at some length, and various amendments and modifications adopted,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, January 24, 1838.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, asked the consent of the House to submit a resolution instructing the Committee on Private Land Claims to inquire whether any, or if any, what further provisions ought to be made by law, for the legal decision of claims for land.

Objection being made, Mr. J. moved a suspension of the rule, but the House refused.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, and by general consent, the House took up the engrossed bill, postponed some days since, entitled "An act to secure the payment of certain commissions on duty bonds to collectors of the customs," and after a few explanatory remarks between Messrs. M'KAY, E. WHITTLESEY and SMITH, the bill was passd.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of calling the States for petitions and memorials; but the House refused—90 to 59: not two-thirds.

SEMINOLE INDIANS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, on leave, reported a bill making a partial appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1838.

The bill having been read twice, Mr. C. sent to the Clerk's table, to be read, a letter from the Secretary of War, and another from the Acting Quartermaster General, setting forth the absolute necessity for an immediate appropriation.

Mr. C. then explained that he had been unanimously instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report this bill of one million of dollars, the amount required for the year being $2,480,000. When that bill should come up, there would, undoubtedly, be a general debate; but, in order that the operations of the War Department might not be stopped, and that the necessary payments might be made, the committee had directed him to report this bill, and ask the House, when it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to go at once into committee upon it.

Mr. DOWNING expressed his hope that the motion of the gentleman from New York would prevail, for it was indispensable that this bill should be passed without delay. He was daily receiving the most pressing letters on the subject, setting forth that, at this time, the troops in the field were absolutely suffering severely for want of subsistence, and that the people, ere long, would be compelled to resort to what they were before driven to, to feed upon horse flesh. Two thousand of the Florida militia have been disbanded without having been paid. If this course is followed up, and moneys are not appropriated, the result will be, that the people in that section of country will lose confidence in the Government, and it will not be in its power hereafter to enlist men into the service. It was his opinion that this war would be brought to a speedy termination, if the means were put in the hands of the Government for carrying it on; and gentlemen need not be apprehensive of its prolongation. The late efforts made there were decisive, and he believed the war would be brought to a close in a very short time.

The bill having been committed—

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to submit a motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole on that, and the bill for the protection of the northern frontier.

Mr. WISE inquired if the motion was a debateable one.

The CHAIR replied that it was not.

Mr. WISE said if it had, he should have offered some objections to going into committee on this bill, for he saw no reason for taking up a partial bill when there was a general bill already before the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG might be permitted, after the remark of the gentleman from Virginia, to repeat what he had before said, that, when the other bill came up, he anticipated a general debate, but the necessity of the present bill was shown from the fact that the War Department had nothing to pay but drafts, and they were returning protested.

Mr. WISE. If the appropriation is now made, there will be nothing to debate about.

Mr. BELL had examined, as well as he could, the grounds upon which this partial appropriation was made; and he believed that there was a necessity for some amount—how much, it would be for the House to ascertain.

Mr. CAMBRELENG'S motion was agreed to—ayes 139, noes not counted.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the above bill.

As soon as it had been read by the Clerk—

Mr. WISE inquired if this bill did not also contain appropriations for other branches of the Indian service.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said this bill was like all appropriation bills. It was for appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities generally.

The bill was then read by the Clerk.

Mr. WISE said this bill was precisely of the character which he expected, before the House went into committee. Instead of its being a mere partial appropriation bill for the immediate exigencies of the service in Florida, it was a general appropriation bill for all expenditures in the Indian service. It was in this way that appropriations were extracted from this House, like teeth, without the proper investigation and inquiry. The officers of Government waited until appropriations were immediately wanted, and then they called upon the House to pass them, without investigation, without inquiry, and without discussion. In this manner that nine-tenths, if not all of the eight, nine or ten millions of dollars which had been appropriated for this fatal, disastrous, disgraceful Seminole campaign had been obtained. We have been told by the delegate from Florida that the troops had been discharged without being paid; and the chairman of the committee tells us this money is wanting, without examination and without debate. Was this the way appropriations were to be made? Would any corporation or company take thirty millions of dollars to pay the expenditures of this disgraceful Indian war. He, for one, would take the responsibility of saying, and acting out what he said, that he would not appropriate another dollar for this purpose until he had some information as to the manner in which former appropriations had been expended, and until he had correct data as to the sums now needed. He wished to know how much had been expended for steamboats which had performed no service to the Government, and the amounts paid to heartless contractors, who rendered no equivalent for the money paid them. He wished information, too, in relation to the perfidy which had been practiced by officers of the army towards these Indians, with all other necessary information, before he was prepared to vote for any other and further appropriations; as he believed the greatest outrages had been committed upon them, which was the only reason of the war being kept up. He felt sufficiently humbled by this outrageous and disgraceful war, and he would rather vote to secure those unfortunate Indians in their hammocks than from them.

Mr. DOWNING said it was with the deepest regret that he had listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia. He had in his possession information which would show the House the necessity of making this appropriation.

The gentleman had charged that the war was iniquitous in its inception, base and infamous in its uses, and would be ridiculous in its conclusion. But he would tell that gentleman, and he defied contradiction, that the war was based on a solemn treaty with the Indians, made deliberately, and with their full consent. Hitherto, there had not been the slightest charge against its validity; not even a whisper had been breathed about unfairness or fraud. The treaty had been executed on the part of Government, not in a hurried manner, but in a calm and deliberate way; the chiefs on the part of the Indians having had ample time to reflect and consider the proposition. But it was with the Seminoles as it was with the Cherokees; who, after having received our money beforehand for their lands, when the time arrived for their evacuation, they then set up the cry of fraud, of unfairness, and of the treaty having been made without their consent, etc. This trait in the Indian character was fully known to all conversant with them; and they might rest assured that as in this, so in every other case, after the money had been squandered and spent, the Indians would refuse to comply with their agreement, and invariably raised such groundless and idle objections.

The gentleman had called it an unfortunate war. So it was. The war had been prolonged beyond the calculation of any human being. But whose fault was it that it had been so prolonged? Was it the fault of the troops engaged in it, or the militia raised for its suppression? No: its prolongation had been caused by the gentleman, and the friends of the gentleman, who now opposed the appropriation. It was well known, and he challenged proof to the contrary, that every officer engaged in the war had acted his part zealously and effectively; but the evil was, that they had to check their efforts, because they were compelled to bend to that sympathy manifested so generally for the "red man" in the North and other portions of the Union, where the true state of things was not known. The only reason that the war was not ended long ago, was, that the troops had been compelled by that sympathy to hold out the white flag to the "poor devils," to give them time to make peace, when they were entirely in our power. If the people of Florida had heard nothing from the pulpit and the press about the wrongs of the "poor Indians," and such ebullitions of blind feeling, the war would long since have been suspended. Had the people of Florida been permitted to adopt their own measures, and if the rope and the gallows had been used, as they would in the case of white men committing such enormities, the affair would have been settled long before this.

But, notwithstanding the atrocious conduct of these villanous objects of sympathy—notwithstanding they had murdered our citizens, destroyed our property and besieged our towns—notwithstanding all this, yet the gentleman refused to grant an appropriation for the purpose of protecting our citizens from a recurrence of such outrages.

But public sentiment and sympathy was ever ready to exert itself for the red man and the negro. The white men of the South might be butchered by hundreds, and the act looked upon with indifference; but when colored skins were concerned, then it was that an outcry was raised. It was for the Indian and the negro for whom public sympathy boiled and bubbled over.

The gentleman had intimated that the people of Florida were "fattening upon the appropriations." He would ask that gentleman to cast his eyes upon their desolated cities, their wasted and impoverished country, and then say from whence had they the means of "fattening on the appropriations." Their horses, their wagons, their provisions and sustenance was gone, and the whole of their property had been destroyed and taken by the enemy. Had the gentleman been able to show but one instance where the public money had fell to the share of the people of Florida, and been improperly used; could he adduce one instance of fraud on their part? It was true that charges had been made in the House, through the medium of anonymous letters, about $10 being paid for wagons, when the same could be had for $5, etc; and it had also been alleged that a certain quartermaster had aken a receipt for more than an article had cost, for the purpose of pocketing the money. But were they thus to be influenced by charges through such sources? If gentlemen knew of any such cases where fraud had been practised, it was their duty to make complaint to the proper department, when they might rest assured that ample redress would be obtained. But for the people of Florida to be told, when they had been deprived of the necessaries of life, that they were getting rich and fattening upon the spoils—

Mr. WISE assured the gentleman that he was laboring under a mistake. He had charged nobody, but had merely expressed a hope that the House would direct its inquiry to the points where suspicion existed. He did not allude to the people of Florida, but to the Government contractors.

Mr. DOWNING begged to inform the gentleman from Virginia, that in the whole Territory of Florida, there was not a single Government contractor. The contracts were made elsewhere, the horses being chiefly obtained from Kentucky, and the provisions and ammunitions from New York and Charleston. The poor citizens of Florida had received nothing but the small pittance of six dollars per month for all their labor, their sweat and their blood; and of even that small sum, gentlemen sought to deprive them, by refusing to vote for the appropriation. Was that proper, after the citizens had been engaged to fight the battles of their country, to refuse to grant them that slender recompense?

Mr. WISE did not mean to be understood as opposing the payment of any just claim against the Government. All he wished for was, that if an appropriation were made, that steps should be taken to insure the people of Florida in getting their due, and to prevent the money from being swallowed up by harpies, feeding on the carrion of that war.

Mr. DOWNING contended that it was the duty of Government, having contracted a debt, and when satisfied of a just claim, to pay it immediately; and then, if any fraud was suspected on the part of agents and others, to make it an after subject of investigation. He had not the slightest objection for a full investigation of the conduct of Government in relation to the war, as he was confident the Government could be justified in every act. The business had been transacted through the means of agents, and if the agents themselves had been deceived was that the fault of Government? Had there been any abuses made known to the proper authorities, which had not been rectified? But because one out of the thousand officers of the militia, who from necessity were made disbursing officers; because one of these had acted dishonestly, was the Government to be held responsible? Was it upon such charges that the appropriation was refused, the time of the House wasted, and the Government assailed?

Mr. D. then alluded to the treachery of the Seminoles, and said he was ready to prove, that although here they pretended to desire peace, yet when they returned to their tribes, they breathed nothing but war. He adverted to the conduct of the two chiefs, Jumper and Alligator, in instigating the enemy to hold out to the end of spring, as Congress would make no appropriation, etc. He referred to three letters which he had received in proof of it, and which were being published in the newsapers of Florida.

It has been charged by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Underwood,) that there were more troops in Florida than the whole number of Seminoles, including squaws and children. For his part, he did not profess to know the exact number of the enemy, but if from the obstacles presented it was found that ten thousand troops were not sufficient, why it was their duty to send twenty thousand. But one gentleman had proposed to draw the troops from Florida. This was certainly a strange course, and he (Mr. D.) was entirely at a loss to ascertain by what rule of arithmetic the gentleman had acted, when because ten thousand were not enough, he proposed to leave but two or three thousand.

Mr. D. then alluded to the peculiarity of the Florida war, and the impossibility of meeting the Indians in a body, so as to attack them with any chance of success. Sir, said Mr. D. they are scattered over the country, east, west, north, and south; they are here and there, and yet nowhere. They were just like a flea, the moment a man put his hand upon one, thinking he had caught him, that instant it would be in some other place. He appealed to the gentleman, if, for the sake of a few paltry dollars, they would sacrifice the lives of our troops, when fighting with a white enemy, by sending out only a certain number. When the war commenced, it was thought that an appropriation of five millions would be sufficient. He thought so too. But because, from a combination of unlooked for events, a greater amount was required, gentlemen complained that the war was unjust, and demanded an investigation. It was the first time he had been told that, after the people of Florida had suffered so severely, their savage foes were to be pitied. He wished gentlemen who said so, would first take the trouble to go and examine for themselves. Mr. D. here drew an amusing comparison of the notorious Nat Turner, once concealed in the Dismal Swamp, and the Florida Indians. He then alluded to the many efforts and applications from various quarters to induce the citizens of Florida to allow the Indians to locate on their territory, and to free their slaves; but he would assure them that they would never submit to dictation; for the people of Florida would not free their slaves, neither would they allow the Indians to remain among them.

Mr. D. went on at some length to comment on the numerous obstacles presented to the troops in carrying on the war, the chief of which was the misplaced sympathy of the public, which compelled the officers to relax from a policy which otherwise could not fail to bring the contest to a speedy termination. He alluded to the unhealthy climate of Florida, which prevented any action during the summer months, and contended that the whole of the fighting season, from the commencement of the war, did not amount to more than nine months. By that means almost insurmountable obstacles were presented, for the provisions had to be recarted, the lost time to be regained, and then the season for exertion was so short that scarcely any thing could be accomplished. Mr. D. concluded by maintaining the justice of the treaty, and the utter falsity of the charges of fraud made by the Indians.

Mr. WISE reiterated his former charges as to the character of the war and its inception, and declared he would prove them, if the House would give him a committee of investigation for that purpose. He expressed his surprise, that the gentleman from Florida had never heard the fairness of the Seminole treaty questioned, for it had been designated as a fraud upon that floor a year ago. It had never been ratified by the Indians, and was no more a valid treaty than was the Cherokee treaty.

Mr. DOWNING explained that he would not take the testimony of Indians or negroes in opposition to that of white people, and the validity of the treaty had never been questioned in Florida.

Mr. WISE said that he would take the testimony of the Government, of our own agents and our own people; and their testimony was that the treaty had not been fairly obtained, and that it was never made with the Seminole nation, as a nation. In making treaties with the Indians, they are to be heard as well as ourselves. He would appeal to the delegate from Florida, who was a lawyer, to say whether it was not necessary when a treaty was made, that both parties should be heard? And he would now say that he believed when the whole matter was fully investigated and exposed, that it would be found and proved that there was no treaty made but a fraudulent treaty. He believed it could be fairly shown and proved that these Indians had been infamously treated, and he would now take occasion to say that he had been furnished with a letter by Secretary Cass from Governor Eaton long before hostilities broke out, asking that a force might be sent there to overawe the Indians and suppress Indian hostilities; yet no force was sent, and no appropriations were asked for, until hostilities actually broke out. The gentleman, therefore, would find it a harder task than he was aware of, to sustain the War Department in the course it had taken in relation to these Indian hostilities. The people of Florida have been struck down, and they ought to know who was responsible to them for the destruction of their houses and their property. He (Mr. W.) had been the friend of these people, and had voted appropriations for their defence without inquiring as to their amount; but these appropriations have been mismanaged by your Government, and the war procrastinated by the course of those in power; and he would not now vote for an appropriation which would go still further to desolate the homes and the altars of the suffering citizens of Florida, until he knew how it was to be expended. He would not wait for the Committee which he desired for investigating this subject, with all the delays and embarrassments which were attendant upon investigations instituted by this House; but he would inquire of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means for a statement of the amounts that might be necessary, and if they were not informed on the subject, he would call upon the Secretary of War to communicate it to the House for the information of all who desired to look into the matter. He was told that the present expenditures in Florida, for the suppression of Indian hostilities, amounted to $73,000 a day. We have already expended eight or nine millions of dollars, and we are no nearer the end of the war, to all appearances, than we were when the predecessor of the gentleman from Florida made his first sympathetic appeal to the House on the subject of the sufferings of the inhabitants of Florida from Indian hostilities.

He (Mr. W.) had voted time after time, and year after year, for appropriations to suppress these Indian hostilities, without inquiry, until the amount of money struck him with surprise, and he was compelled to pause and inquire into the matter. He considered it a public duty that he should do so, after eight or nine millions had been expended, and troop after troop had been defeated; and the Indians, although but a handful at first, still remained masters of the soil. What a spectacle we were presenting to the world! A short time ago this Government threatened France with a war, and were now talking about calling upon England for an explanation; yet with all her surplus millions, her regular army, her marines, her chosen Tennessee troops, and all her militia, could not put down some eight hundred or a thousand Indians. It was impossible for the gentleman to defend the War Department after such management as it had been guilty of, and he contended that that department was responsible for the act of every one of its agents, whether petty or important agents. He went on to charge perfidy and treachery upon the officers of the Government, in seizing upon Oceola and Micanopy, while they were under the white flag which ought to have protected them. He charged upon the War Department or its agents, the employment of a delegation of Cherokees as mediators, and after they brought in some of the leaders of the Seminoles, they were treacherously seized upon by Gen. Jesup, and sent to prison. The Seminoles were tempted to a consultation in consequence of an arrangement being made with the Cherokees for that purpose, and when they came into the consultation, they were seized and held as prisoners of war.

Mr. DOWNING stated that the Indians alluded to came in after General Jesup had stated to them, through persons that had seen them, that he would receive nothing at their hands but an unconditional surrender. Mr. D. knew not what information the gentleman from Virginia might have in his possession, or what testimony might be given by others on the subject; but this that what he had stated he believed to be the facts; and furthermore, he would say, taking into consideration the cold-blooded and inhuman murders these Indians had committed, if he (Mr. D.) had been in General Jesup's place, he would have hung them up on the crooked limb of a yellow pine tree.

Mr. WISE said, that the gentleman's personal feeling might have led him to do an act of inhumanity which he would have repented afterwards; but he could not believe, if the gentleman had made a pledge to these Indians, as Gen. Jesup undoubtedly did, that he would have been guilty of perfidy in disregarding that pledge. If he had caught the Indians by fair means, or by a stratagem laid without violating a pledge to them, it would have been a very different matter, and then he might perhaps have been justified in using harsh means towards them. Mr. W. then went into some details in relation to the Cherokee mediation: that they had been employed by the Government; that they had gone out to consult with the Seminoles; that they had brought in some of the Seminole chiefs at the second consultation, and that they had failed in their third consultation because of the perfidy of General Jesup; which news had been carried to them by an Indian runner, sent up by the Seminoles to await the issue. Mr. W. then stated that letters had been written to the Cherokee delegation, as well as to the Secretary of War, by General Jesup, testifying to the manner in which the mediation had been conducted by these Cherokee Indians.

Mr. EVERETT here produced the letters alluded to, and they were read from the Clerk's table.

Mr. DOWNING then produced and read letters addressed to himself, from persons acquainted with the facts, setting forth that the Cherokee delegation had informed the Seminoles, that if they held out this winter, that they would be left in possession of their country, as Congress would make no appropriations to carry on the war.

Mr. GLASCOCK remarked that the delegate from Florida might state that it was understood that General Jesup himself now believed that the Cherokee delegation had proved treacherous.

Mr. WISE proceeded, and stated that the gentleman from Florida had been guilty of precisely that which had been charged upon him (Mr. W.) —the reading to the House of an anonymous letter; but (as he had looked into the gentleman's letter by this permission) he would now tell the delegate from Florida, that the same person who wrote that letter should come up as a witness, in consequence of other letters which he had written him (Mr. W.) in case he ever obtained an investigating committee. He went on again to charge a double perfidy on the officer at the head of affairs in Florida, in the taking of the Indian chiefs before alluded to. He then referred to, and read extracts from, a letter of Gov. Eaton's, written in March, 1835, being the March preceding the December in which the war broke out, in which the Governor doubted the legality of the treaty, and the propriety of carrying it into effect; but recommended, if it was to be carried into effect, that a large force might be sent to overawe the Indians, otherwise the consequences might be fatal.

Mr. DOWNING explained that Gen. Eaton had retracted all that had been said in that letter; and legislative action had been had upon it in Florida, and he believed the Governor was ashamed that he had ever written it. The fact was that every citizen of the United States, who went into that Territory, went there with his heart overflowing with sympathy for those Indians; but after removing there, and seeing the treachery and dishonesty of them, their opinions soon became very much changed. He had no doubt if the gentlemen who had so much sympathy for them on this floor, had had their cattle and servants stolen, and their relations murdered, that their opinions would change.

Mr. WISE resumed, and went on to detail the manner in which Mr. Eaton had been induced to retract what had been said in the letter just referred to. He (Mr. W.) had called upon the War Department for information in relation to the Seminole war, and Mr. Cass himself had sent him various letters, which, he said, were sent confidentially, and in those letters he had learned how it was that Gov. Eaton had been induced to retract what he had before said. These letters were sent to him as confidential when he called for information, but he was not to regard letters as confidential when they were the regular letters of the Departments on their files.

Mr. W. referred also to a number of other letters confirmatory of the views, and recommending the same advice, as Governor Eaton, and then entered into a review of the Indian policy of the Government, which he was convinced would, in the end, result in a general combination of them on the whole of our western frontier.

Mr. CILLEY defended the policy of the Government; which, he insisted, was humane and benevolent. The sympathy evinced for the tawny red men, he described to be of the same character as the hobby professed for the race a little darker in the North. When he found his country at war, he was not for staying to inquire into its origin, or to investigate little, petty, miserable details about it, but to take such measures as would be most likely to bring it to a favorable termination. Whether the Government had pursued the best course or not, whether there had been a prodigal expenditure, he feared there had, he could not say, but he was for continuing the war with vigor, on the old New England plan, where the Indians had been wholly exterminated; for it was false policy and false philanthropy to carry on a feeble war.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON expressed his regret that this discussion had been brought on; the only relief for his pain at it was in the bold truths told by the last gentleman. Mr. T. then entered into a reply to Mr. Wise. He denied that Mr. W. could prove there was no treaty; and if he could, he had not proven there was no necessity for this appropriation to give meat and bread to those who had been fighting the battles of their country, nor was this the fitting occasion to go into that question. Mr. T. then entered into a review of the circumstances of the Florida war, and defended the plan originally proposed by General Scott. Mr. T. adverting to the sympathies at the North for the Indians, said he could not shut his eyes to the fact that it arose from a hatred to their own race. He expressed his strong disapprobation and unmeasured condemnation of what he regarded as the dishonorable capture of Oceola, offering, as it did, the first instance in the history of this country where an American officer had refused to respect a flag of truce.

Mr. EVERETT then obtained the floor, and expressed his regret that any debate should have arisen on this subject at this time; the more so, because he had every reason to believe that the House and the country would be perfectly satisfied with the response of the Secretary of War to Mr. E's resolution on the topics adverted to in this discussion. This was in relation to the capture of Oceola.

Another subject upon which he wished to make a remark or two was a more painful one, viz: in reference to the capture of Sam Jones and his companions. Mr. E. had every reason to know that these men came in under the most sacred pledges, and that it was with the greatest difficulty the Cherokee delegation could induce them to come in. And when they did, what was Gen. Jesup's first proposition? Why, as preliminary to any negotiation, that those people should bring in their wives and children; and what was Sam Jones's answer? Why, that he never heard of such a preliminary to a treaty as that of surrendering the children and arms, and that he could not assent to it.

After some further remarks, Mr. E. avowed himself unwilling to carry on this war any longer, though he was not for yielding. He wished a pacificatory course to be tried. He would arm the Executive with authority and appropriations to enable him to adopt a course which should terminate it pacifically.

Mr. HAYNES said, without intending to answer, or attempting to reconcile, the mistaken opinions he had heard, and many of which he had regretted to hear, he had risen solely for the purpose of bringing back the committee to the question before it. Some weeks ago the Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill to cover the whole sum necessary for the current year. Since that bill was reported, the committee had been called upon or notified by the War Department that drafts were lying over for services already performed, and supplies already furnished, and there was no money to meet them. Upon this representation the Committee of Ways and Means had come to the House and asked a suspension of its rules, for the purpose of considering the propriety of making a partial appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities. Now, neither the committee, nor, as Mr. H. believed, had any other friend of the Administration, who proposed to support this bill, designed taking the House by surprise. The very document read at the Clerk's table gave to the House the information that this partial appropriation was asked for under extraordinary circumstances; and it was equally well known that the bill covering the whole sum estimated for the service by the Secretary of War then remained untouched, for as general, liberal, violent discussion as gentlemen pleased. Why, then, should so many irrelevant topics be brought in now, of national honor, the validity of the treaty, the conduct of the war, the treatment of the Indians, the conduct of the Cherokee delegation, or any thing else? The state of the case called upon them to act promptly; it asked them for an appropriation under circumstances of great stress upon the Department of War; and he did hope, under these considerations, and with feelings as strong upon some of the topics introduced to-day as any other man, and as willing, if not as able, to discuss them; he implored the committee to report this bill, and take a future occasion, when the general bill was brought up, to enter upon the general debate.

Mr. BELL adverted to the remarks made by him this morning in favor of the bill, and wished the House to bear them in mind, for he was opposed to the course of his friend from Virginia. He then made some strictures upon a letter from the Washington correspondent of the Richmond Enquirer, which he pronounced to be an unfounded, false, and malicious slander.

After some further remarks by Messrs. ROBERTSON and CAMBRELENG, which will appear hereafter,

Mr. WISE moved to amend by striking out "one million," and inserting "five hundred thousand dollars;" when, without taking the question,

On motion, the committee rose and reported,

And the House adjourned.

SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 23, 1838.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of Jacob Marks, praying for increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HUBBARD also presented the petition of Julius S. Fox; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the petition of William Patton; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of the inhabitants of Baring county, Missouri, praying for the establishment of a new post route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. McKEAN presented a petition from sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union: laid on the table.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the memorial of Jacob Lang and others, made an unfavorable report thereon.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Charles Hoyt.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the same committee, reported without amendment the bills for the relief of James Callan and Ann W. Johnson.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Daniel Trueheart; and,

On motion of Mr. ROANE, the same was laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER rose in his place, and made the following remarks:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Having received, some days ago, unquestionable information of the payment of fishing bounties and pensions in Massachusetts, in bills of the Commonwealth Bank of the city of Boston, by which payment heavy losses had been sustained by meritorious and well-deserving persons, I felt it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the subject, and to move an inquiry, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the circumstances from the proper quarter.

In consequence of this public proceeding, dictated, on my part, by nothing but a sense of obligation, the official paper of the Administration in this city, on Saturday last, published the following paragraph:

"DEBTORS TO THE COMMONWEALTH BANK OF MASSACHUSETTS.—The names of five or six gentlemen, friends of the Administration, are given as debtors to the exploded bank at Boston, and its bankruptcy is held up as the consequence of loans to them. The truth is, the only real Democrats whose names are paraded as borrowers, owe it only a few thousand dollars, which they are able to pay thrice over. If all its loans were as safe as those thus exhibited to show the reason of its insolvency, the bank would be the soundest in the Union, for it would be without a bad debt. The Conservative loans ruined it. We understond that Mr. Webster has had his bills protested in this bank for $10,000 at a time.

"In his resolution of inquiry into the state of the bank, therefore, we find no demand made as to the amount of bills protested in it any time, nor for the names of the drawers."

Now, sir, if I owe the Commonwealth Bank a dollar, I am not conscious of it. If I ever did owe it a dollar, I do not remember it; nor do I recollect, or believe, that any note signed by me, or any bill accepted by me, or by any agent, or clerk of mine, in my behalf, was ever protested at that bank, or delayed in payment.

Having said this, sir, I may be relieved from making any remarks of my own on the character of this publication. I will only read a remark of the Editor himself, in the same column, which contains the publication, and which remark is in the following words:

"These attacks upon the private concerns of public men, for party purposes, are exceedingly despicable."

So thinks the Editor, and I, for one, concur with him in opinion.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the memorial of the inhabitants of Palmyra, praying to have the benefits of the pre-emption laws allowed them, of which they had been deprived in consequence of being adjacent to certain reserved tracts, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, inasmuch as the general pre-emption law, now before the Senate, embraces the case of the memorialists.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the Senate, directing them to inquire into the expediency of purchasing the Mount Vernon estate. Also from the further consideration of the memorial of the Rev. Philander Chase, asking for a pre-emption to a certain tract of land, for the purpose of aiding him in the establishment of a college.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Pierre Menard and others, reported the same with amendments; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which had been referred the bill from the other House for the relief of Curtis Grubb, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same Committee, to which had been referred the memorial of the legal representatives of Patrick McGibbons, deceased, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of C. Wall of St. Augustine, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRENTISS presented several petitions from Vermont, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and,

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the question as to their reception was laid on the table.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the extent of the mineral lands of the United States so far as ascertained; the quantity of said lands already leased; the time for which said lands have been leased; the rent received by the United States, and the injury, if any, sustained by the working of said mineral lands.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting measures to obtain such information as is necessary to enable Congress to reorganize the custom house branch of the public service, in a manner more economical and better adapted to the public exigencies.

The Steamboat bill was taken up, discussed for some time, and after being amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to revoke the charters of such of the banks of the District of Columbia as shall not resume specie payments within a limited time, was taken up as the next general order; and,

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, Thursday next.

REGULATION OF STEAMBOATS.

Mr. MORRIS moved to reconsider the vote given yesterday on the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Indiana; which motion was lost.

Mr. DAVIS suggested the reconsideration of the vote given on the amendment of Mr. NILES.

Mr. CLAYTON was of opinion that the amendment went to a most unreasonable extent. These boats were not unfrequently owned by large incorporated companies; in some instances as many as from five hundred to one thousand persons, and some of these widows. To make them in any way liable for the negligence or culpability of others did not comport with his ideas of justice; and if the amendment were retained, he would undertake to say that no jury would ever be found to convict the parties. He thought the amendment had passed yesterday, without being duly looked into and considered.

Mr. NILES had no objection to the vote being reconsidered.

Mr. SEVIER then suggested that if this amendment was to be adopted in some other shape, that two engineers would be indispensable, as one could not at all times be present; and to subject that officer to punishment for the ignorance and incapacity of others, would be going further than he was disposed to do.

Mr. NILES asked if there was any thing more criminal than jeopardising the lives of passengers through the ignorance or incapacity of the engineer. Mr. N. knew very well how these affairs were managed with some of these boats: they first had a skilful engineer at $100 per month, and next they took a fireman for the duty at $20 or $30 a month; and it was not unfrequently from the incapacity of these persons that so many accidents had occurred. He was for placing such guards as might prevent these evils in future: he thought he could modify his amendment so as to meet the objections of gentlemen. Mr. N. then so modified it as to make the owners and masters responsible for all damage to property and person; and it was adopted.

Mr. NORVELL renewed a motion, made by him yesterday, and lost, in relation to compelling boats to have a life-preserver for each passenger, and so modified it as to compel steamboats to have a life-preserver for each berth.

Mr. DAVIS said there might be some utility in these life-preservers: he was not prepared to say there was not; but why make them applicable only to steamboats? Why not extend them to all the packets—in short, to make them applicable to every kind of marine conveyance? Human life was not more valuable in steamboats than elsewhere. He (Mr. D.) was willing to go on and make the bill as perfect as practicable; but, after all, he must confess that he had very little confidence in the measure. Something in relation to the subject is certainly due, however, from Government. On this head there was much to grapple with—carelessness, ignorance, intemperance, &c. He was for the strongest measures that could be adopted to render the bill efficient. Mr. D. adverted to the circumstance that no dangerous occurrences had taken place in the steam navigation between New York and Providence, and contended if more care were observed, that these fatal injuries would not so often happen.

Mr. NORVELL alluded to the frightful loss of human life on board the steamboat "Home" for the want of this article. If a tithe only of the persons drowned on that melancholy occasion have been saved by the adoption of "preservers," he thought it indispensable that vessels should be provided with them. At all events, the experiment was worth trying, and he hoped no objection would be made.

The question was then taken on the adoption of Ms. NORVELL's amendment, and lost by a vote of 16 to 18.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana then made an offer to introduce his amendment in a modified shape, which was argued for some time between Messrs. STRANGE, BAYARD, and others, on the bearing of the law.

The amendment was lost; and the bill having been reported to the Senate, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill, as amended, reads as follows:

A BILL to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of all owners of steamboats, or vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, on or before the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, to make a new enrolment of the same, under the existing laws of the United States, and take out from the collector or surveyor of the port, as the case may be, where such vessel is enrolled, a new license, under such conditions as are now imposed by law, and as shall be imposed by this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the owner, master, or captain of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, to transport any goods, wares, and merchandise, or passengers, in or upon the bays, lakes, rivers, or other navigable waters of the United States, from and after the said first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, without having first obtained, from the proper officer, a license under the existing laws, and without having complied with the conditions imposed by this act; and for each and every violation of this section, the owner or owners of said vessel shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of five hundred dollars, one-half for the use of the informer; and for which sum or sums the steamboat or vessel so engaged shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily, by way of libel, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offence.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the district judge of the United States, within whose district any ports of entry or delivery may be, on the navigable waters, bays, lakes, and rivers of the United States, upon the application of the master or owner of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, to appoint, from time to time, one or more persons skilled and competent to make inspections of such boats and vessels, and of the boilers and machinery employed in the same, whose duty it shall be to make such inspection when called upon for that purpose, and to give to the owner or master of such boat or vessel duplicate certificates of such inspection.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the person or persons who shall be called upon to inspect the hull of any steamboat or vessel, under the provisions of this act, shall, after a thorough examination of the same, give to the owner or master, as the case may be, a certificate, in which shall be stated the age of the said boat or vessel, when and where originally built, and the length of time the same has been running. And he or they shall also state whether, in his or their opinion, the said boat or vessel is sound, and fit to be used for the transportation of freight or passengers; for which service, so performed upon each and every boat or vessel, the inspectors shall each be paid and allowed by said master or owner applying for such inspection the sum of five dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the person or persons who shall be called upon to inspect the boilers and machinery of any steamboat or vessel, under the provisions of this act, shall, after a thorough examination of the same, make a certificate, in which he or they shall state his or their opinion whether said boilers are sound and fit for use, together with the age of said boilers, and duplicates thereof shall be delivered to the owner or master of such vessel; one of which it shall be the duty of the said master and owner to deliver to the collector or surveyor of the port whenever he shall apply for a license, or for a renewal of a license; the other he shall cause to be posted up, and kept in some conspicuous part of said boat, for the information of the public; and, for each and every inspection so made, each of the said inspectors shall be paid by the said master or owner applying, the sum of five dollars.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the dutty of the owners and masters of steamboats to cause the inspection provided under the fourth section of this act to be made at least once in every twelve months; and the examination and trial of the strenth of the boilers of his boat, required by the fifth section, at least once in every six months; and deliver to the collector or surveyor of the port where his boat or vessel has been enrolled or licensed, the certificate of such inspection; and, on a failure thereof, he or they shall forfeit the license granted to such boat or vessel, and be subject to the same penalty as though he had run said boat or vessel without having obtained such license, to be recovered in like manner. And it shall be the duty of the owners and masters of steamboats licensed in pursuance of the provisions of this act, to employ on board of their respective boats, a competent number of experienced and skilful engineers; and in case of neglect to do so, that said owners and masters shall be held responsible for all damages to the property or any passengers on board of any boat occasioned by an explosion of the boiler or any derangement of the engine or machinery of said boat.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever the master of any boat or vessel, or the person or persons charged with navigating said boat or vessel, which is propelled in whole or in part by steam, shall stop the motion or headway of said boat or vessel, or when the said boat or vessel shall be stopped for the purpose of discharging or taking in cargo, fuel, or passengers, he or they shall open the safety-valve, so as to keep the steam down in said boiler as near as practicable to what it is when the said boat or vessel is under headway, under the penalty of two hundred dollars for each and every offence.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the owner and master of every steam vessel engaged in the transportation of freight or passengers, at sea or on the Mississippi river, the tonnage of which vessel shall not exceed two hundred tons, to provide and to carry with the said boat or vessel, upon each and every voyage, two long-boats or yawls, each of which shall be competent to carry at least twenty persons; and where the tonnage of said vessel shall exceed two hundred tons, it shall be the duty of the owner and master to provide and carry, as aforesaid, not less than three long-boats or yawls, of the same or larger dimensions; and for every failure in these particulars the said master and owner shall forfeit and pay three hundred dollars.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the master and owner of every steam vessel to provide, as a part of the necessary furniture, a suction-hose and fire engine and hose, suitable to be worked on said boat in case of fire, and carry the same upon each and every voyage, in good order; and for a failure to do which they, and each them, shall forfeit and pay the sum of three hundred dollars.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the master and owner of every steamboat, running between sunset and sunrise, to carry one or more signal lights that may be seen by other boats navigating the same waters, at some suitable point near or at the bow of said boat.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the penalties imposed by this act may be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States, in the district or circuit court of such district or circuit where the offence shall have been committed, or forfeiture incurred, or in which the owner or master of said vessel may reside, one-half to the use of the former, and the other to the use of the United States, or the said penalty may be prosecuted for by indictment in either of the said courts.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person, employed on board of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his or their respective duties, the life or lives of any person or persons on board said vessel may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and, upon conviction thereof, before any circuit court of the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labor for a period not less than two nor more than ten years.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Indiana and Illinois, was taken up, and postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Friday next.

PRE-EMPTIONS TO SETTLERS.

The bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky observed that this was a very important measure, and he presumed that no Senator intended to press it. Its discussion would take up a good deal of time, and he thought that Senators should have some time allowed them to prepare for it. He would propose to postpone the bill, and make it the order of the day for next Monday week.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama thought that, if the motion prevailed, it would be equivalent to postponing it for some months to come. He was satisfied that the Senator from Kentucky did not wish to give the bill the go-by in that manner. Tuesday week, Mr. C. said, was set apart for the consideration of the important measure in relation to the finances. Another important measure, the bill relating to the banks in the District of Columbia, was set for Monday; and other measures of importance would come up about the time named by the gentleman. He did not apprehend that this pre-emption bill would occasion so much discussion as the Senator supposed. There was nothing novel in it, nothing extraordinary—the subject was well understood, and this bill was so simple in its provision that he could not see how it could create any difficulty. The obnoxious feature in the pre-emption bill of the last session—that relating to floating claims—had been stricken out, and it now contained no provisions to which any well founded objections could be urged. He hoped the Senator from Kentucky would consent to a postponement to a shorter day.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that the bill did contain some novelty, notwithstanding. Certainly, said he, we have had pre-emptions enough; but to throw open the whole public domain to every man who will call himself a pre-emptioner, was a novelty reserved for this bill. He did not, however, intend to enter into the merits of the bill, but he made these observations for the purpose of showing that it was not the harmless measure that gentlemen supposed. He was sure that when they did take it up it would not be one day nor two days under discussion, but would perhaps occupy them for weeks.

Mr. WALKER wished the bill to have an early consideration, because extensive land sales had lately been ordered, and if these took place before the passage of the bill, many meritorious individuals would be deprived of its benefits. If Congress was disposed to give to the actual settlers a portion of the land improved by them, it was important that the bill should pass at an early day, so that the lands might not be sold before the industrious cultivator could have an opportunity of securing his improvements. Mr. W. concluded by moving to make the bill the order of the day for Thursday next.

Mr. KING of Alabama was in hopes that the Senator from Kentucky would have seen nothing in this bill of the alarming character which he seemed to apprehend. The bill of the last session, Mr. K. said, embraced other and more extended provisions than were to be found in the one before them, which occasioned the protracted discussion the Senator referred to. It was in the provision relating to the actual settlement on which so much time was consumed. Mr. K. believed that there was always a disposition to give to actual settlers a portion of their improvements; and he had hoped that for so small and reasonable a matter the Senator from Kentucky would have permitted it to pass by quietly and without unnecessary delay. The reason assigned by the Senator from Mississippi was a good one, and he hoped it would have its due weight with the Senate. The objectionable features having been removed from the bill, he indulged the hope that it would not have to encounter the opposition of the Senator from Kentucky, and that he would see the propriety of either modifying his motion so as to give it an earlier consideration, or that he would accept the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said the Senator from Alabama was certainly very coaxing; but he could not view the matter in the same light the Senator from Alabama did. He would undertake to say that we should have applications for the passage of pre-emption laws to the end of time. These people would go on choosing the best parcels of the public land, and applying to Congress for pre-emption rights, until they reached the Pacific. We had been told by the President, in his message, as well as by the Senator from Alabama, "only pass this bill, and it shall be the last." Mr. C. however, did not believe these claims would ever cease. He thought the time rather short, and would prefer that the bill should be fixed for a later period.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped that the consideration of the bill would not be delayed beyond Friday next. The proposition, he said, was now in a more simple form than it had ever been presented to the Senate, and he was satisfied that a majority of the Senate would approve of it in its present form, or with a few modifications.

Mr. BENTON was opposed to any delay. If the bill were postponed for two weeks, it might be delayed for months, from the circumstance of losing its place in the calander. There was no Senator, he presumed, who was not familiar with the subject and prepared to vote at once without a word being said, as their minds were made up on one side or the other. While up he would take occasion to say that he hoped the practice of the Government for the last forty years would not be reversed or discontinued. He was entirely in favor of the system. The best evidence of the pre-emptionist wishing to become a cultivator, was his going into the forest, cutting down the trees, and erecting his little cabin; he was in favor of all such settlers.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLAY'S motion to postpone until Monday week, and lost.

The question was next taken on Mr. WALKER'S motion, and carried, so that the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for Friday next.

The bill from the House to secure the payment of certain commissions on duty bonds to collectors of the customs, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill to create the office of surveyor of public lands in the Territory of Wisconsin, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others, directors of an association, called the New England Mississippi Land Company; was, on motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, postponed until Monday next.

The bill for the relief of William East, was taken up and considered; and after being explained and advocated by Messrs. CLAY and KING of Alabama, and opposed by Mr. TIPTON, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 24, 1838.

SEMINOLE WAR.

As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked the consent of the House to go into Committee of the Whole again on the "bill making a partial appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1838."

The motion was assented to without a division, and the House accordingly went into committee, Mr. CONNOR in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the above bill.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. WISE to reduce the appropriation from $1,000,000 to $500,000.

As soon as the question had been announced,

Mr. THOMPSON, referring to what he had said yesterday, said that he had not said that the whole North felt sympathy with the Indians, only because they were our enemies. He did not believe such to be the universal feeling of the North. He hoped and believed that it was not now even the general feeling. If he thought so, he would not hesitate one moment to leave, to cut loose, if need be, from the Confederacy. That a portion of the northern people were influenced by such feelings, he did not doubt.

Mr. BIDDLE said it had been his wish to speak on the subject before the rising of the committee yesterday, and nothing had occurred in the intervening period to change his views. He could not suppress his surprise at the course pursued yesterday. The debate which then took place commenced with the appropriation bill, and left off in a discussion on the abolition of slavery. That discussion was provoked by a struggle between the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from South Carolina, as to which was the most bitter opponent to the North.

Mr. WISE stated that the gentleman had totally misunderstood him. He was not an enemy of the North. He had always been a friend to the North, but at the same time he was a friend to the South.

Mr. BIDDLE went on to complain of the unfairness of Southern gentlemen in making denunciations against the North in relation to abolition, when the Representatives of the North were tied down from replying by a resolution of the House, which forbid all discussion on the subject. But he would tell those gentlemen that if ever the abolition question came to a crisis, the whole responsibility and calamity of the result would fall upon them. Mr. B. was proceeding, when

Mr. PATTON protested against any further discussion on that subject, which was quite foreign to the question before the committee.

Mr. BIDDLE said he would waive any further remarks on that subject, and confine his remarks to the question of appropriation. He asked what were the reasons urged for requiring this enormous appropriation from the pockets of the people. They were told that the emergency of the case required it, and, on this ground, the House was called upon to act precipitately. But his short experience had given him an opportunity of examining such pretexts, and of the manner of forcing bills through the House by such pressing importunities. They were invariably taken by surprise in these cases, and the appropriations were not asked until there was an "emergency," and then there was no time to discuss the matter. He would ask if such had not been the practice during the whole eighteen months of General Jesup's command in Florida. He, for one, would protest against voting any more money under such pretexts. He, for one, was willing to assume the responsibility, and to go home to his constituents, and tell them that he had refused to vote for an appropriation of another million, without knowing to what use it was to be applied. The treasures of the country had been squandered long enough. The main artery of the Treasury had been bleeding for a long time, and it only required a few gallons more to complete its exhaustion. Yes, he was willing to go back to his constituents, and to say, that after fifteen millions had been expended in that war to no purpose, he refused to grant fifteen millions more, until some satisfactory explanation had been given as to its object.

The gentleman from Florida had said much about the employment of the Cherokees, and had contended, that if those Indians had not been employed, the war would have been ended long ago. But who was it who employed the Cherokees? Was it the action of that House? No. Was it the action of the Government? No. But it was an idle experiment of General Jesup, who had superseded General Scott, and who had pledged himself to undo all that had been done by the latter. Mr. B. reviewed, at some length, the proceedings of the court of inquiry, in relation to the conduct of General Scott, whom he contended was a brave and gallant officer, who had been recalled from Florida at the moment he was striking the decisive blow, by the dishonorable conduct of Gen. Jesup, in writing a private letter to the editor of the Globe, condeming the course of his commanding officer. He adverted to the early history of General Scott, his gallant conduct in the war with Great Britain, and other matters laudatory of that officer.

He concluded by commenting on the alleged intrigues constantly carried on at the seat of Government, and contended that until the time should arrive when the officers of our army and navy could rely entirely on the protection of Congress, our national honor would never be secure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was unwilling to be driven into a hasty passage of this appropriation without due examination, for he had already voted cheerfully for upwards of ten millions to put an end to the Florida war. There was another reason. At the commencement of the session, a resolution introduced by him had been adopted, calling upon the Secretary of War for information in relation to the proceedings there; but no response had yet come in. He would not say that the withholding of this information would induce him to withheld the money. On the contrary, he was disposed to give the money, and should continue to do so, for the present at least, on the principle that when his house was on fire he would try and first put it out, and inquire into the cause of the conflagration afterwards. Mr. U. deprecated the course of these ex parte trials and condemnation of Generals Scott and Jesup. Take the case of the capture of Oceola, for which the latter had been censured: had they all the facts before them? They had not; but the letter of Gen. Jesup justified that act, for it appeared that Oceola had come in with a perfidious intention, and Mr. U. adduced parallel instances in the early wars of the West, known to all. He objected, however, to such denunciations, on either side, before all the facts were ascertained. With reference to Gen. Jesup, he had before read to the House a letter from that officer, in which he stated that he (Gen. J.) wished a most full and ample inquiry into all his transactions, both in the Creek and Seminole campaigns. As to the letter to F. P. Blair, he held that it had been improperly used; but the writer was not responsible for that, for he had marked it "private," and did not address it directly to the President of the United States; but even if it had been addressed to the President directly, Mr. U. held that the second in command had a right, and it was his duty, to make known what he believed to be the truth to the commander-in-chief. Take the case of Gen. Hull: supposing him to have been guilty of intriguing with the enemy, and that his second in command knew it, would any one have censured the latter for making that fact known to the then commander-in-chief, the President of the United States? Again, it should be remembered that Gen. Jesup had voluntarily retracted all he had said in relation to Gen. Scott. Mr. U. did not, however, believe that the delay of this war was the fault either of our Generals or the army, for he believed they had all done the best they could. The fault lay in sending too large a force, ten or twelve thousand men, en masse, and the remedy, he thought, would be to pursue the same course they did in Kentucky many years ago: act by detail, in small parties, protected by forts, &c.

Mr. GLASCOCK said, that in consequence of the latitude which this debate had taken, he felt it to be a duty which he owed to himself, as well as to the section of the country which he in part represented, to make some remarks in reply to gentlemen who had preceded him on this question. He exceedingly regretted the course which this discussion had taken; but inasmuch as this course of debate had ensued, he wished to be permitted to make some remarks in reply. At the commencement of the present debate, charges serious in their character had been made against the General Government as to the policy it had pursued towards those Indian tribes; but he was convinced, if the gentleman who made the charges had given to the subject that attention which he generally gives questions which he investigates, he would have come to the conclusion that some of the remarks which he made were not justified by the facts in relation to the treaty made with the Seminole Indians. One charge of the gentleman from Virginia, who had but followed up the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont on a former occasion, was, that the treaty with those Indians was a fraudulent treaty. He (Mr. G.) well recollected the time when that charge was first made by the gentleman from Vermont, and he also well recollected the bold and manly reply which was made to it by the then delegate from Florida on this floor. The general charge in relation to the treaty not being valid, was predicated on the ground that the time for carrying it into effect had expired before it was ratified by our Government. He would say to gentlemen, however, if they would take the trouble to refer to the treaty itself, and to the ground then assumed by the delegate from Florida, they would find that every doubt would be removed as to the validity of that treaty with the Seminoles, notwithstanding all their sympathies for these Indians; and they would at once admit that the Indians had been treated with the utmost humanity and liberality by the General Government. They would find, also, that the delay complained of as the cause of rendering the treaty null and void, was occasioned by the act of the Indians themselves. In the treaty of Fort Moultrie with these Indians, there were certain conditions precedent, which it was not necessary here to enter into, but which all could see, who chose to refer to it; and in the subsequent treaty of Payne's Landing, one of the conditions of it was that some of the principal chiefs should visit the country to which it was contemplated to remove them; and upon their being satisfied with the country, and making certain arrangements with the Creeks, the treaty was to be ratified and carried into effect. This treaty was made in 1833; and if the treaty was not sooner carried into effect, it was because the Indians had not sooner complied with their part of the treaty, as gentlemen would see by a reference to a history of the matter. Gentlemen were entirely mistaken in supposing that it was the fault of the Government that the treaty was not sooner ratified: it was the fault of the Indians themselves; and even if this House had the power to render this treaty null and void, the facts of the case would not justify it. Well, after the treaty was ratified, and it was found that Gen. Clinch, acting under the authority of the Government, was unable to remove them within the time specified, another year was given them, so that they might not be put to any great inconvenience. This was done in 1835, and at that time not a voice was raised in Florida against the validity of the treaty; but all fully acknowledged it as binding upon them. Furthermore: when this General Government, which was now charged with so much inhumanity and perfidy towards these Indians, found them in a starving condition, appropriations were made for their support and maintenance, and many of them owed their lives to the liberality of the Government in thus providing for them. With what justice, then, could gentlemen stand up here and say that it was attempted by our officers to destroy this whole race of unfortunate people? Gentlemen, too, in referring to the history of the transactions in Florida, have extolled Oceola to the skies, and held him up as an example worthy of imitation, whilst our own officers have been held up to public indignation and scorn. They should, however, recollect the murders which that Chief has committed, before they attempt to eulogize him; they should recollect the cold-blooded murder of General Thompson by this chief with the very instrument which he had been entrusted with in confidence, before they bestow on him their praises; and they should recollect that it was his perfidy which laid low a brave and a gallant officer who had placed the utmost confidence in him. If such a deed as this had been committed by a foreign enemy, or by one of our own officers, it would have subjected him to eternal infamy; yet for this act this chief is proclaimed a brave, a gallant, and a noble warrior, by gentlemen on this floor. Mr. G. admitted Oceola to have been a desperate foe. He believed him to be a brave man, and so are many assassins; so are many murderers. They fear nothing in the day or in the night, and are prepared to commit the most daring acts of bravery, and will arrest your civil authority; but are these the men to be held up to public admiration by honorable gentlemen on this floor?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Biddle) had used language, and resorted to arguments, which he (Mr. G.) little expected on the present occasion. When, however, he recollected the gentleman's known hostility to every movement of the General Government, he was willing to make some allowance for him. Mr. G. would ask what had the proceedings of the Government in relation to Treasury notes, and what had the characters of Generals Jesup and Scott, to do with the present question before the House? He concurred entirely in the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Understood,) that it was improper to pronounce condemnation upon the officers of our army without giving them a full and a fair hearing. A blow, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, has been aimed at General Scott's integrity, and the sword has been struck from his right hand by a blow from behind. Well, sir, might he not retort upon the gentleman in the same manner, and say that an attempt was now making to do the same thing with regard to another officer of our army? The gentleman had referred us to the fields of Chippewa and Niagara for the gallant exploits of General Scott, and has told us how his youthful bosom glowed when he heard of the triumph of our arms on those occasions; but had the gentleman forgotten the valorous deeds of Jesup on those same battle fields, and that General Brown himself had said that this gallant officer was foremost in the blaze of battle? No man, said Mr. G. can read the history of those times, or can look back to them, without awarding to General Jesup praises for as great bravery as any of his brother officers. If a blow has been aimed at the character of General Scott, so also is General Jesup, who is now fighting the battles of his country, about to be condemned without a hearing. Mr. G. was ready and willing to award due praise to all our gallant officers, and would condemn none of them without a hearing, as he thought such a course little fitting a grave deliberative assembly. With regard to the treachery of the Cherokees which had been alluded to, he hoped they might be enabled to clear themselves of it, as he should be sorry to see such an imputation rest upon them; and as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) had admonished the delegate from Florida not to make this charge against those Indians without proof, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would take the same admonition from him, not to make charges against the Executive Departments of our Government without the proof. If the gentleman would take of him this admonition, he anticipated that many unpleasant discussions would be avoided, and much unpleasant feeling prevented. But it had been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, if these Cherokees had proved treacherous, and evil had resulted from their mission, those who employed them were to blame for it. Now, Mr. G. had no doubt that this delegation had been employed at the instance, or at least with the sanction, of the Secretary of War; but he was far from believing that that officer was censurable for thus employing them. His motive in their employment was good, and it was wrong to censure him for the failure of the mission. Mr. G. also denied that the principal was responsible in all cases for the act of the agent, as had been asserted by the gentleman from Virginia. Suppose the gentleman and himself had employed an agent to perform a certain service in the making of a contract or otherwise, and tha agent had committed a fraud, were they to be held accountable for that fraud? He thought not. In regard to the statements represented to have been made by the Cherokees to the Seminoles, that if they would only hold out this winter, Congress would refuse to make farther appropriations, and the war would cease, he had only to say that there was a remarkable coincidence between the statement of the Cherokees and the course of certain gentlemen on this floor.

Mr. G. proceeded at some length to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Biddle,) and concluded by urging upon the House the propriety of making the appropriation asked for by the bill under consideration.

Mr. BYNUM commented, at some length, at the inconsistent course of the gentleman in opposition to the appropriation. He deprecated the idea of making it a party question. For his part, his aim would invariable be, first for the good of his country, and next for his party. He adverted to the history of ancient republics, and adduced instances to show, that in all cases their ruin had been accomplished by faction, and by party contests. He could scarcely conceive how gentlemen could oppose the appropriation, and enter into an investigation of the conduct of their officers, at the very time when the war was going on. Such a course was calculated to retard every measure, to dishonor the commander, and unnerve the soldiers. Such a course was wholly unprecedented, for a Government to go into an investigation of the conduct of an officer, while that officer was engaged in the field. Mr. B. adverted to the conduct of the Government during the war with Great Britain, and in relation to Mexico, and the course of the Opposition in relation to it. He went into a history of the movements of that party; and said it was evident that the war which the Government had most reason to fear, was the war of a Bank of the United States.

Mr. B. was proceeding to reply to some of the arguments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Biddle,) in relation to the abolition question; when

The CHAIR suggested that such a course was not in order.

Mr. BYNUM said that if he had digressed, he was but following the example set by others, and he would cheerfully submit to the suggestion of the Chair. He then resumed his defence of the Administration, and expressed his opinion that there was not a single member who had a serious doubt on the propriety of granting the appropriation, unless they had made up their minds to refuse all appropriations and make an infamous peace with savages.

Mr. POPE gave a statement of the facts which had induced the Committee of Ways and Means to report this bill, substantially the same as that given by Mr. CAMBRELENG yesterday, and that it had been therein unanimously acted upon. He beseeched his friends, of all parties, to arrest the farther progress of this discussion, and report the bill. The war was now going on, it had been recognised by both Houses of Congress, and they were compelled to appropriate money for its suppression. He was anxious for investigation, and whenever the proposition was brought forward to go into an examination of its origin and causes, and its subsequent proceedings, he should give it his cordial support. Some investigation was necessary. It had already cost the country some fifteen millions of dollars. The people of Kentucky desired it, for the committee of inquiry at Fredericktown had cost more money than had been expended in the acquisition of the two States of Kentucky and Tennessee, the fairest portion of North America.

Mr. CAMBRELENG united his voice to that of the gentleman from Kentucky, for the immediate passage of this bill. The Committee of Ways and Means, in reporting this partial appropriation had done it for the express purpose of avoiding all discussion, and not interfere with the other bill, which would open the whole merits of the question. Mr. C. stated, in addition, that he had received, since yesterday, a communication from the Secretary of War, stating that the Subsistence and the Quartermaster's Departments were without funds, and that the Paymaster General had drafts upon him to the amount of upwards of $100,000 without the means to meet them. He again stated that the general bill would offer ample opportunity to discuss this whole subject.

The question was then taken on Mr. WISE's amendment, and it was rejected without a division.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

CANADA FRONTIER.

The committee then took up and considered the "bill making an appropriation [of $625,500] for the protection of the Northern frontier of the United States," and then rose, and reported the two foregoing bills to the House.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays on ordering the Indian appropriation bill to be engrossed; which were ordered, and were—Yeas 164, Nays 2, and the bill was then read the third time and passed.

Before the vote was announced—

Mr. HAWKINS of North Carolina rose, and stated that he was momentarily out of his seat when his name was called; and the vote on the bill being so near to unanimity, he hoped therefore that he might be permitted then to record his vote in its favor, but it was objected to.

The "bill making an appropriation for the protection of the northern frontier of the United States" was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and having been engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of the appropriations and expenditures of that Department under each specific head.

Also a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the names, duties, periods of service, salaries, &c. of the Clerks in that Department.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

The above were severally laid on the table; and then,

On motion,

The House adjourned.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the communication from the Governor of the State of Vermont, asking for an extension of the franking privilege; and also from resolutions of the Legislature of Mississippi on the same subject; which motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. NILES,

The Committee on Manufactures was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the Indiana Pottery Company, praying for a donation of land.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered, and adopted:

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to the Senate the report made to the Department of War since the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, by the District Attorney of the United States for the district of New Jersey, concerning the claim of Henry Gale and others to the Pea Patch island in the river Delaware, together with the opinion of the Attorney General, and any other documents in the Department relating to the subject, not heretofore communicated to Congress.

The bill to provide for the legal adjudication of certain land claims in Louisiana and Arkansas, was taken up, and, on the suggestion of Mr. MORRIS, laid on the table.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BENTON then moved to take up the bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States. Mr B. explained all the leading features of the bill, and said he believed there was no diversity of opinion in relation to the necessity of an increase of the army; but he believed there did exist much diversity, as to the best mode of effecting so desirable a result. Some thought it more advisable to fill up the companies, without increasing the regiments, while others were for increasing the number of regiments. The bill before them was the same as that resolved on at the last session; though, if any gentleman was desirous of recommitting the bill, in order to test the strength of the Senate in relation to an increase of of the number of regiments, he should be satisfied for it to take that course. Mr. B. read a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending an increase of three regiments, and filling up the companies to the number of sixty-eight.

Mr. BAYARD spoke of the lamentable deficiency of officers experienced on many occasions lately, and the general necessity there existed for an increase of the army. The only difference on the subject was, whether the skeleton should be filled up, or the frame still further extended. He would move to recommit the bill, with instructions to increase the regiments to the number of three, and fill up the companies to the number of sixty-eight.

Mr. PRESTON spoke generally against an increase of the officers; he thought they were sufficiently numerous without increasing them; it was men that were most wanted; in many places there were not enough to keep up the ordinary drill. The rank and file might no doubt be increased advantageously, without much expense, and without any increase of the patronage of the Government.

Mr. TIPTON was of opinion it would be most advantageous to increase the rank and file, rather than officers. The staff, in his opinion, was already sufficiently large. If men were added, the officers would be rendered more efficient.

Mr. CALHOUN thought if an increase of the army was needed, it would be safest to increase the regiments. Experience has shown that where there were good officers, a tolerable good soldier could be made in seven or eight months.

Mr. PRESTON asked for the ayes and noes on the motion to recommit, when there appeared for the motion 15, against it 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Pierce, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, and Tipton—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

Mr. BENTON then proposed to amend the bill by adding to the commissariat of subsistence one assistant commissary general of subsistence, with the rank and emolument of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry; one commissary, with the rank and emolument of a quartermaster, and three commissaries, with the rank and pay of assistant quartermasters; which amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CRITTENDEN wished the bill recommitted. We had already more officers than were necessary, and yet they were asked to increase them to a still greater extent. He would, therefore, move to recommit the bill to the committee, with instructions to strike out that portion relating to an increase of the officers, and increasing the staff of the army.

Mr. BENTON said an increase of the staff of the army had been touched on, he believed, by every Secretary since the last war. Mr. B. went on to show the absolute necessity that existed for the contemplated increase. We had twenty millions of property scattered over a surface of upwards of eight thousand miles, and in some cases there was not a responsible officer to take care of or guard it from injury. We had to employ civil engineers at a greater expense, and to far greater extent, than any contemplated increase by that bill; men not subject to the rules and articles of war; in short, men over whom they had no control.

Mr. B. here read statements from the Secretary of War, and high military officers of the army, to sustain the views he had taken. Orders had been given from the Department, which it was physically impossible to carry into effect, for want of the proper officers. Mr. B. alluded to a large appropriation made for some purpose at the mouth of the Mississippi, which could not be effected for want of a proper officer.

Mr. BUCHANAN was of opinion that some increase of the topographical and military engineers was necessary. While up, he would be glad to learn from the chairman whether any provision was contained in the bill to prevent the employment of engineers by private companies. He was not aware, indeed, that the regulations now permitted it; but he believed it was formerly practiced, and to some considerable extent. Then there was some reason for it, as civil engineers were scarce; but now the necessity no longer existed, as they were scattered all over the country. Mr. B. said he understood from men of tried experience, that an augmentation of the ordnance, topographical and military engineers was necessary. He hoped the Senator from Kentucky would withdraw the motion to recommit, and let him hear what the military gentlemen in the Senate would suggest.

Messrs. TIPTON, NICHOLAS, and BENTON followed.

Mr. TIPTON then moved to amend the ninth section by striking out "the two assistant quartermaster generals and the two deputy quartermaster generals," provided in that section.

The motion was taken on this amendment and lost—there being 15 for and 16 against it.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, since he had made the allusion to the circumstance of officers of the army being employed by railroad and canal companies, he had additional evidence that such had been the practice to a great extent, and that officers of the army had accumulated large fortunes in the service of these companies, while the business of the Government was neglected. He would, therefore, offer the following amendment to the second section of the bill:

"Provided that no officer of the said corps shall be employed in any service, for any State or company, for which he shall receive any compensation except his pay from the United States."

This amendment being concurred in, the bill was further amended, so as to give the President the authority to cause two regiments of infantry to act as a regiment of riflemen when expedient.

The bill having been reported as amended, was ordered to be engrossed, and reads as follows:

A BILL to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be added to each company of artillery of the army of the United States, one sergeant major, in lieu of the present first sergeant, one quartermaster sergeant, two corporals, and fifty-eight privates; and to each company of infantry, one sergeant major, in lieu of the present first sergeant, one quartermaster sergeant, one sergeant, two corporals, and fifty-eight privates; and to each company of dragoons, one sergeant major, in lieu of the present first sergeant, one quartermaster sergeant, and one saddler, which saddler, in addition to his clothing and subsistence, shall be allowed twenty dollars per month; and there shall be added two principal musicians to each regiment of artillery. And the force authorized by this act to be added to the present military establishment, and the officers herein authorized to be appointed, shall be subject to the laws and regulations which now govern, or may hereafter govern, the military establishment of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to add to the corps of engineers, whenever he may deem it expedient to increase the same, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, six captains, six first and six second lieutenants; and that the pay and emoluments of the said corps shall be the same as those allowed to the officers of the regiments of dragoons, provided that no officer of the said corps shall be employed in any service for any State or company, for which he shall receive any compensation, except his pay from the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act passed the twenty-ninth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, entitled "an act making further provision for the corps of engineers," as provides that one paymaster shall be taken from the subalterns of the corps of engineers, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that the paymaster, so authorized and provided, be attached to the pay department, and be, in every respect, placed on the footing of other paymasters of the army.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the corps of topographical engineers shall be organized and increased, by regular promotions in the same, so that the said corps shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, four majors, ten captains, ten first lieutenants, and ten second lieutenants.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That vacancies created by said organization, over and above those which can be filled by the present corps, shall be taken from the army, and from such as it may be deemed advisable of the civil engineers employed under the act of the thirtieth of April, eighteen hundred and twenty four; that the pay and emoluments to the officers of said corps shall be the same as are allowed to officers of similar rank in the regiments of dragoons.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the authority to employ civil engineers, in the act of the thirtieth of April, eighteen hundred and twenty-four, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, after the passage of this act.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint so many assistant adjutants general, not exceeding four, with the brevet rank, pay, and emoluments of a major, and not exceeding four, with the brevet rank, pay, and emoluments of a captain of cavalry, as he may deem necessary; and that they shall be taken from the line of the army, and, in addition to their own, shall perform the duties of assistant inspectors general, when the circumstances of service may require.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the officers to be taken from the line and transferred to the staff, under the last preceding section, shall receive only the pay and emoluments attached to their rank in the staff; but their transfer shall be without prejudice to their rank and promotion in the Line, according to their said rank and seniority; which promotion shall take place according to usage, in the same manner as if they had not been thus transferred.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to add to the quartermaster's department not exceeding two assistant quartermaster generals, with the rank of colonel, two deputy quartermaster generals, with the rank of lieutenant colonel, and eight assistant quartermasters, with the rank of captain; that the assistant quartermasters now in service shall have the same rank as is provided by this act for those hereby authorized; and that the pay and emoluments of the officers of the quartermaster's department shall be the same as are allowed to officers of similar rank in the regiments of dragoons: Provided, That all appointments in the quartermaster's department shall be made from the army, and when officers taken for such appointments hold rank in the line, they shall thereupon relinquish said rank, and be separated from the line of the army; and that promotion in said department shall take place as in regiments and corps.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the quartermaster general be, and he is hereby, authorized, from time to time, to employ as many forage-masters and wagon-masters as he may deem necessary for the service, not exceeding twenty in the whole, who shall be entitled to receive each forty dollars per month, and three rations per day, and forage for one horse; and neither of whom shall be interested or concerned, directly or indirectly, in any wagon or other means of transport employed by the United States, nor in the purchase or sale of any property procured for or belonging to the United States, except as an agent for the United States.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, That there be added to the commissariat of subsistence one assistant commissary general of subsistence, with the rank, pay and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry, one commissary of subsistence, with the rank, pay and emoluments of a quartermaster of the army; and three commissaries of subsistence, with the rank, pay and emoluments of assistant quartermasters.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the stewards of hospitals at posts of more than four companies be hereafter allowed the pay, clothing, and rations of a sergeant of ordnance; and, at all other posts, the pay, clothing, and rations of the first sergeant of a company of infantry.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of Thomas Griffin, heir at law of Corbin Griffin, praying for bounty land: Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. TIPTON presented the petition of sundry citizens of Miami county, Indiana, praying for the passage of a pre-emption law: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented two petitions from the merchants of Philadelphia, praying that an appropriation may be made for the completion of the frigate Raritan, now on the stocks: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN presented two petitions, one asking the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and signed by thirteen ladies of Garrettsville, in Portage county, Ohio; the other, against the annexation of Texas, and signed by fifteen citizens and fifteen ladies of the same place.

Mr. A. said, that these petitions came in a letter addressed to his friend, the Hon. J. W. ALLEN, of the House of Representatives, from Ohio; but that, as the letter requested that the petitions should be presented in the Senate, his friend of the other House had supposed that the letter was intended for himself, (Mr. ALLEN of the Senate,) and had therefore handed the petitions to him, with a request that he would present them in the Senate.

The petition relative to Texas was then laid upon the table, and the motion to receive the other petition was also laid upon the table.

Mr. ALLEN also presented a memorial signed by sundry citizens of the county of Belmont, in the State of Ohio, and remarked, that this memorial comprehended three several subjects arising out of the unquiet state of our relations with the Governments of Great Britain and Mexico. He said that the memorialists, after, in the first place, stating the circumstances attending the destruction of the steamboat Caroline and the murder of our citizens within the American jurisdiction, by a body of English subjects, acting under the authority of British commissioners, pray that our Government may accept of no atonement for this outrage from the British Government, short of a surrender to our tribunals of the guilty persons, to be tried and punished according to the forms of our law. The memorialists then proceed to express their hope, that no law may be passed, and no measures taken by our Government, to restrain our citizens from interposing, as individuals, in behalf of the patriots of Canada; and that if any such law exists, it may be repealed. A statement is then given, by the memorialists, of what they are informed and suppose to be the conduct of the British Government in reference to the subsisting relations between this country and Mexico; and they ask that our Government may take such measures in this matter, as may be necessary to sustain the rights, the honor and the dignity of this nation.

I shall, sir, (said Mr. A.) submit a remark or two upon but one of the subjects embraced in this memorial—that of the destruction of the Caroline, and the slaughter of our citizens on board. It is due to ourselves to arrest the impression sought to be made upon the judgment of the world, that this outrage is justified, as an act of retaliation, for like offences charged to have been previously committed by our citizens within the British territories of Canada. The facts authorize no such conclusion. Whatever may have been the indiscretion of some of our citizens in yielding to those impulsive sympathies for the patriots of Canada so natural to our countrymen, yet it is evident that, as a nation, we are in these transactions "more sinned against than sinning."

If a few of our citizens, thoughtless of the danger to which their conduct might expose the neutrality of their country, have interposed in the affairs of Canada, they have done so as individuals, each man upon his own responsibility, without the sanction of our law, or the authority of our Government. If they have voluntarily withdrawn from their own country, and placed themselves within the jurisdiction of the British empire, they stand exposed to the penalties of the British law, for any infraction of its provisions, not as citizens of the United States, but as individuals found there, without regard to the fact of their citizenship in any particular country. As individuals acting severally beyond the limits and without the authority of this Government, this Government is not responsible for their acts. Government can act upon individuals no longer than whilst they are within its jurisdiction, or employed in its agencies abroad.

In anticipation of these movements of our citizens, whilst yet within our limits, our Government has taken every precautionary measure exacted by the most rigid obligations of neutrality. But, on the other hand, how stands the case of the destruction of the Caroline, and the murder of our people? Was that the act of individuals? No: it was the result of an organized authoritative movement—a movement in obedience to the orders of a British Colonel; executed, in person, by a Captain of the Royal Navy, with her Majesty's commission in his pocket. It was a public act, in violation of neutrality, in violation of the public law of the civilized world; it was the act of a Government, and will so stand through all time, if not expressly disowned and amply atoned for by the primary Government of England. It is to be hoped that it will be so disowned, and that atonement made which justice to an injured nation requires.

As matters now stand, the same justice requires us not to anticipate the possibility that the present incumbent of the British throne could so far sully he incipient glories of a virgin reign as to sanction midnight assassination, committed upon the sleeping citizens of a friendly power, under the color of a British commission. But, in any event, I doubt not, that the American Executive will take such measures in relation to this important subject as will best comport with the interests, exact atonement for the wrongs, maintain the rights, and guard the honor, of the Republic.

Mr. A. then moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was done accordingly.

Mr. NILES presented the petition of a number of publishers of Hartford, Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of an international copy right law: referred to the Committee on Patents.

light at St. George's Bank: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. ROBBINS:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to furnish to each member of the Senate one copy of the documents on the subject of the public lands, directed to be compiled and printed by the resolutions of the Senate of the 26th February, 1833, and 3d January, 1834.

The report of the Committee on Finance unfavorable to the petition of S. Morris Waln and others, was considered and concurred in.

The following bills were severally read the third time, and passed:

The bill to authorize the Commissioner of the Patent Office to issue a patent to James Smith; and

The bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States.

The following bills from the House were severally read twice, and referred:

The bill making appropriations for the protection of the Northern frontier of the United States; and

The bill making a partial appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1837.

PRE-EMPTIONS TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

The bill granting the right of pre-emption to actual settlers on the public lands, came up as the order of the day.

Mr. WALKER arose, and explained at great length the merits of the bill, going into a critical examination of the bearings of its provisions upon the actual settler, and the happy influence it would have in enhancing the value of the unsold lands of the country. By the bill, in its present shape, Mr. W. contended that no frauds on float exemptions could take place. It excluded all grants, and simply confined the settler to the space he occupied, giving him preference in the purchase, at the Government price, over the speculator. It prevented him from interfering with the sites reserved for town lots, or lands reserved for purposes of education or internal improvement by the States, under the law of the United States. It was, therefore, not so broad in its provisions "as to extend to the Pacific!" but limited in its nature confining the settler to States and organized Territories, where the Indian title was extinguished. The simple operation of the bill was merely to give the hardy and adventurous pioneer of the West a preference over the greedy speculator, and what injury could accrue to the Government from such a proceeding? That settler who left the comforts of civilization to seek a new home, reclaiming the lands from their rude state, subduing the forest and building his cabin in the before untrodden wilds of the wilderness, was surely entitled to such a preference; and unless it could be shown that some great loss would accrue to the Government, from the establishment of the pre-emption principle, the Senate must be convinced that the preference ought to be given to the pre-emptionists. Mr. W. here read a statement showing that of all the immense amount of public land thrown into the market, the price was not affected more than two cents an acre on the average by pre-emption rights; and that so far from these pre-emptionists being an injury to the public property, they gave an increased value to it. It was population in the immediate neighborhood that gave value to the public lands, which otherwise would bring little or nothing, however fertile; because destitute of settlers. But suppose the Government could get two cents more from the speculator, should the honest and hardy cultivator be driven from his property that he had toiled so hard to secure? He would like to take the Senator from Kentucky through the new States, and show him the worthy and enterprising citizens from the North and South, applying at the Register's office to buy in their farms, and that cold and heartless speculator trying to overbid him, he would then have his eloquent and powerful support in favor of the measure, instead of his present opposition to it. We have been told, said Mr. W. of the many frauds that occur under the system, but he had yet to have them authenticated before he lent a credulous ear. But suppose a fraud had occurred, was that to prevent the passage of the law? If we legislate on such a principle, we might as well blot out the statute book. Where was it that frauds had not taken place? Look to the revenue. As well might we say that we would repeal the tariff, because frauds have occurred at the custom-house. He, Mr. W. would undertake to say that where one fraud had occurred under the pre-emption laws, that a hundred had taken place in avoiding the payment of duties. Pre-emption affidavits had not yet become proverbial, like custom-house oaths. Where one fraud had occurred under the laws of pre-emption, hundreds would take place in the absence of it. Speculators had in fact traversed the country, making memoranda of the farms, and presenting themselves to the settlers, extorted money from them, by telling them that unless they paid so much, they (the speculators,) would bid against them at the land sales. In this way thousands upon thousands of dollars had been filched from the poor. From 1807 to the present time, pre-emption laws have been passed, giving a preference in purchase to the actual settler, and should we abandon the system now, because we are told they will go on for ever asking the passage of the same laws. Yes, said Mr. W. God grant they may go on adding to this glorious Republic State after State, until we have one long line of States to the Pacific. Who helped to give to the Union, Indiana, Illinois, and others, but these same actual settlers. Yes, this meritorious and excellent class aided materially in adding these new stars to our national flag. Mr. W. thought it mournful to see the change of feeling that has come over Congress in relation to this pre-emption law. Once it was the favored child of the Republic, and was a principle incorporated with the Government as far back as it could be traced. Why change the system now? Had the cultivator become less useful or less meritorious? He appealed to every Senator to say whether there was not a sense of justice within him compelling him to vote to extend this privilege to so useful a class of citizens.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky inquired whether there was any statement showing the amount above the minimum price for which lands had been sold at the public sales? If he understood it, the average price had been taken by mixing up together all the land sold, both at public and private sale.

Mr. WALKER did not know whether the discrimination alluded to by the Senator from Kentucky had been made, but he was prepared to show that the average was what he had stated.

Mr. WHITE moved the following as an amendment:

"Provided always, that this act shall not be so construed as to give right of pre-emption to any person or persons in consequence of any settlement or improvement made before the extinguishment of the Indian title to the land on which such settlement or improvement was made.

Mr. WHITE said that the object of his amendment was to give to every man who was an actual settler on the public lands on the first of December last, a pre-emption, provided the Indian title was extinguished at the time he made the settlement. If the pre-emption law was so extended as to give its benefits to those who have, in violation of treaties, settled on the Indian lands, it would operate to encourage persons to do so in future. It would be in vain for us to think that we can keep peace with the Indians, if we establish the principle that the man who intrudes on their lands shall be rewarded with a pre-emption as soon as a treaty is made for his contempt of the laws and violation of their rights. We have information (said Mr. W.) that there are thousands of persons now in the Indian country, every man of whom will be entitled to a pre-emption under the bill as it is, provided treaties are held and the Indian titles extinguished this winter.

Mr. WALKER replied that the language of the bill excluded the cases cited by the Senator from Tennessee. Mr. W. read extracts from the bill, showing that the Indian title must have been extinguished before any individual can avail himself of any of its provisions. In addition to this, he said the bill contained the following proviso: "The provisions of this act shall not extend to any lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished." Pre-emptions would not, therefore, be granted to lands to which the Indian title may be extinguished by treaties that may be held this winter. He could not think, therefore, that the bill would embrace the cases cited by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama opposed the amendment, as it would interfere with the rights of many of his constituents whom he wished to have the benefits of the bill, and who settled in the Indian country in Alabama with the consent of the Indian proprietors, and without any injury to the United States. Mr. C. was as much opposed as any man, to any violation of the rights of the Indians or of the United States; and would go for the amendment with a proper modification. He would, therefore, before the question on the amendment was taken, submit an amendment to the text of the bill, which he hoped would be acceptable to the Senator from Tennessee, and would obviate the necessity of his amendment. Mr. C. then moved to amend the bill by inserting a proviso that it shall not apply to any lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished six months.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he rose to thank the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. WHITE) for the suggestions thrown out, and embraced by the amendment offered; and they were the more gratifying, coming, as they did, from so distinguished a source as the head of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The object of the amendment (if he understood it correctly) was to secure from intrusion lands not settled by treaty.

He (Mr. C.) would ask the Senator from Mississippi what became of his argument in favor of the bill, if the amendment suggested by the Senator from Alabama prevailed? The Senator from Mississippi says that his bill precludes from pre-emption all those who have settled on the public lands prior to the extinction of the Indian title; while the other seeks to include those in the rights who had settled there in anticipation of such an event, by invitation from the Indians themselves—a bargain made with Indians in anticipation of the surrender. If such a system were to prevail, where would it stop? Who was there that did not anticipate the extinction, in process of time, of the Indian title to the whole wide range of land to the Pacific itself? He hoped that all trespasses on the public land, or Indian lands, would be prevented. These pre-emptions were mere struggles to get possession of the public domain, and had ever a tendency to violate the rights of the Indians. Let us, at least, (said Mr. C.) if we cannot protect the public property from lawless intrusion, endeavor to protect the poor Indians, whose rights we were so solemnly pledged to shield from aggression.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he was as much opposed to the violation of treaties, or of Indian rights, as the Senator from Kentucky, or any other man, and would be the last man to give any sanction to it. But he denied that in the case of the Alabama settlers any injury had been done to the Indians or the Government. He was under the impression that individuals had been permitted, under the authority of the officers of Government, to occupy the improvements they purchased from the Indians.

Mr. NILES made a few observations in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, and condemnatory of the practice of intruding on the lands of the Indians.

Mr. KING of Alabama defended the officers of Government (certifying agents, &c.) from the implications of the Senator from Tennessee. He had taken great pains to inform himself, and he was satisfied that, with one exception only, a more faithful, vigilant, and efficient set of officers never were in the public service. One of the certifying agents had been dismissed for improper conduct, and the certifying of another had been set aside on the ground that he had been imposed on by persons bribing Indians not entitled, to personate those who were entitled, to reservations. He was sorry that his friend from Tennessee had thought proper to make such sweeping denunciations, as he was satisfied that the officers were vigilant, faithful, and efficient. While up he would take occasion to say that, in general, it was a very good rule that an individual should not get a pre-emption in consequence of his having encroached on the Indian lands. But if they adhered strictly to that rule in a pre-emption law, many an individual, whose claim was meritorious, would be excluded.

Mr. WHITE said that these frauds were spoken of by an agent of the Government. He hoped they were not so numerous as had been represented. He would be glad to exempt the persons by name from participation in any such deeds. That frauds have been committed, of a most gross and sickening nature, there could be no doubt. Not only had they induced one poor Indian to personate another Indian in the purchase of these reservations, but had taken the lands, in many instances, for the paltry sum of ten dollars; and even that was taken from them when they left the certifying office. He believed it before, and still believed it, that these frauds were on a much larger scale than was generally supposed. In the first instance, one set of agents had been sent to certify, and then another to examine the certificates; and last, a board of commissioners had been appointed, that had alreayd been in session some two or three years, without giving us any thing authentic; and when they would, God only knew. He had said, and still maintained, that the main cause of our disturbances grew out of the corrupt practices of the agents that had been sent among these people, and were not owing to the reservations, as had been affirmed. It was always painful to him to advert to such things, and he would not voluntarily have introduced the topic. His remarks had grown out of the observations of the Senator from Alabama, (Mr. Clay,) on the question whether the amendment ought to provide that no man should have a pre-emption right who had settled on lands prior to the time the Indian title had been extinguished. He thought it became the Senate especially to set its face against the violation of any treaty or stipulation with the Indians.

Mr. TIPTON said that he should vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, (Mr. White,) prohibiting the granting of pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, who had settled and made improvements on lands owned by the Indians. He thought we owed it to our own reputation, as well as to the solemn obligation of our treaties with these people, to protect the rights of the Indians; and those who entered and made improvements on their lands, had no right to expect a pre-emption, even if those lands have since been purchased from the Indians.

Sir, (said Mr. T.) I cannot vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Alabama, (Mr. CLAY,) prohibiting pre-emptions on lands that were not purchased from the Indians more than six months before the first of December last; and it is proper that I should state my reasons for this vote. They are these: in 1834 a treaty was negotiated with the Miami Indians in Indiana, by which they ceded a portion of the most valuable lands in that State, situated on the line of our canal, near to our flourishing villages; but the President of the United States refused his sanction to that treaty at that time. He placed it in the hands of a commissioner, with instructions to obtain the consent of the Indians to the modifications. It has been modified; and the Senate will recollect that this treaty was ratified at the late extra session of the Senate in October last. He had read and presented to the Senate petitions from citizens of Miami county, Indiana, asking Congress to pass a pre-emption law. He did not pretend to say that these petitioners were entitled to pre-emption, or that Congress should permit pre-emption on these valuable lands; but he could not vote to prevent his own constituents, his own neighbors, from the benefits extended to others. The State would probably ask Congress to grant her all these lands at $1 25 per acre, to aid her in constructing her public works. He was in favor of giving the State those lands on the terms he had indicated; but he could not vote to take away the supposed right of the persons referred to, though he did not believe their case a very strong one.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said, while he was endeavoring to defend one right, he was not aware that he would be trenching upon others, he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana expressed his regret that the amendment should have been withdrawn, and he should feel compelled to renew the motion. He had a high respect for the feelings which actuated his colleague in relation to these settlers, many of whom were also his (Mr. S's) friends; but he was impelled by a higher consideration, to wit: the duty he owed his State. Mr. S. here went into a long explanation in relation to these lands; the best, he said, in any country, and had been set apart to aid the State in her internal improvements. These lands were not frontier lands, but situated in the middle of the State, and had been taken possession of by those families with the full knowledge of all the facts in relation to them; and hence they could not expect to have a pre-emption right.

Mr. TIPTON said that he regretted to differ from his colleague, but he could not vote for the motion, for the reasons before stated. If he can vote to disfranchise our own constituents, he must not expect me to go with him. He had supported the internal improvements in which the State they represented was embarked. He would do every thing in his power to obtain the grant to the State; but a regard should be had to individual justice. He did not believe that pre-emption rights could rest on the late purchase from the Miami tribe of Indians.

He had a fellow feeling for settlers in the western woods. He had spent all his life with them, knew well what they suffered in penetrating the forest, felling the timber, and breaking the soil to raise bread for their families. They make roads, build mills, extend civilization. They do more: they repulse the enemy, and defend the soil; and he could give no vote to withhold justice from this meritorious class of people. He was in no way interested, directly or indirectly, in pre-emption claims. He would go as far as his colleague to obtain aid to the State, and thought it could be done without prejudicing their own constituents who are asking Congress to pass a pre-emption law.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky here submitted the following resolution; which, by general consent, was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the quantity of all the public lands which has been sold at public sale, the aggregate amount of the purchase money, and the average price of each acre so sold: distinguishing between the sales made prior and subsequent to the introduction of the rule of cash sales.

Mr. C. now moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WALKER hoped not, and asked the yeas and nays: the question on adjournment was decided in the negative, by a vote of 25 to 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morriss, Prentiss, Roan, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and Williams—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Walker, White, Wright and Young—25.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky called the attention of the Senate to the amendment. One of the Senators from Indiana was in favor of the lands going to the poor man, while the other was for claiming them for the poor State. In this vote he would go for the whole State, rather than the few individuals in violation of what was deemed right.

The question was then taken on Mr. SMITH's amendment, and lost by a vote of 28 to 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, and Tallmadge—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

Mr. SMITH then moved to amend the amendment of Mr. WHITE, by inserting after it the words, "nor to any land on which the Indian title had not been extinguished six months prior to the first day of December last."

On this question the yeas and nays were ordered, and there appeared for it 18, against it 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, King, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, and Tallmadge.—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

Mr. YOUNG moved to amend the bill by inserting after the word before, the words "the date of any treaty by which"—the effect of which was to include pre-emptions where the land was settled before the date of the treaty extinguishing the Indian title. This amendment was lost without a division.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. WHITE, which was also taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 36, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Ky. Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Mc Kean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, White and Williams—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Pulton, King, Lyon, Norvell, Robinson, Walker, Wright and Young—10.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, January 26, 1838.

The first business in order was the motion of Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, to reconsider the adverse report on the establishment of a district court of the United States, at Tuscaloosa, Alabama. The report was reconsidered, and

On motion of Mr. LAWLER,

The subject was committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. L. intimating that his desire was to name some other point for the consideration of the Committee.

Mr. RARIDEN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Stafford and the other heirs at law of Joseph Stafford of the revolutionary line of New Hampshire.

DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS.

Mr. RAIRDEN asked leave to offer the following resolution, which was read.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to furnish such members of the present House of Representatives as have not received the same under former orders with the following books, to be paid for out of the contingent fund of this House, being such as have been supplied to members of the last and preceding Congress, viz:

The Diplomatic Correspondence, The Documentary History of the Revolution, The Land Laws, American State Papers, Register of Debates, Contested Elections, and Commercial Regulations, Elliott's Debates, and Elliott's Diplomatic Code—

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the reprinting of either of the above works.

Objection being made—

Mr. R. moved a suspension of the rule, which was agreed to—yeas 129, nays not counted.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution, which were ordered.

Mr. HAYNES thought that some of these books had never been furnished to old members.

Mr. McKAY would be glad to know from the gentleman who offered this resolution, if there was not a proviso attached to the bill making appropriations for the contingent expenses, expressly prohibiting any portion of the expenditure to be made therefrom, except for the ordinary purposes of the House. If that be the case, this resolution was not in order, because it would be necessary to make a new appropriation, which must be considered in Committee of the Whole.

In reference to the merits of the resolution, he said it was a practice which, if not put a stop to, would form an indefinite claim upon the Treasury, for there would always be new members, and they would claim copies of all the books ever given to members of old Congresses. He was not prepared to say what expense this resolution involved, but he supposed somewhere about about forty or fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. BRIGGS understanding that it had never been given to members before, moved to strike out "Elliott's Diplomatic Code."

Mr. RARIDEN only desired to include the same books given heretofore to the old members.

Mr. EVERETT thought that book had been one of the number.

Mr. McKAY adverted to the Documentary History as represented to have been supplied to former members, which was not the case, for not a single copy had been furnished to them. The resolution, therefore, stated what, in point of fact, was not true.

Mr. TILLINGHAST contended that, if the resolution embraced the same books heretofore ordered, it was not material whether the books had been received or not. It was but right and fair that the new members should be placed on the same footing as the old. If it was proper for the nation to furnish books to its legislators, it was only right that all should be furnished equally; and if there was any difference, it should be in favor of the new members, who might be supposed to be more in want of them than the old.

Mr. BRIGGS, understanding that the "Diplomatic Code" was included in the former resolution, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. RARIDEN sent to the Clerk's table a resolution including that work, but, on referring to the proceedings of the House upon it, it appears to have laid on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS therefore renewed his amendment.

Mr. BRONSON, in reply to Mr. McKAY, remarked that the contingent appropriation bill had not been passed, and therefore they were not tied up by the proviso alluded to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG apprehended his colleague was mistaken if he thought the proviso would not be passed by the House, unless the present Congress differed very essentially in opinion from the two former Congresses. It had been invariably introduced into each bill for the last four years, and was designed to correct what Mr. C. considered a growing abuse, of paying matters entirely foreign to it out of the contingent fund. The same proviso was in the bill reported this session, and he believed would be again sanctioned by the House. Whether the books were purchased or not, he did hope that appropriations of this character would not be charged upon the contingent fund of the House, by which it had been enormously increasing, from year to year, by the action of the House itself. If this appropriation were made, let it be done by law in the usual way.

Mr. BOND expressed his surprise that the House should suspend its rules, and set aside all its business, for the purpose of considering a resolution of this kind; a resolution looking alone to the personal benefit of the members. He strenuously opposed the measure, and asked if the House was aware of the expense it involved? When the former resolution was under consideration, he recollected that a then member from Tennessee, (Mr. Cave Johnson,) made a calculation demonstrating that it was about one thousand dollars to each member, in the aggregate upwards of one hundred thousand dollars. Mr. B. insisted that they had no right, in the present exhausted state of the Treasury, thus to give to themselves the people's money; and if Congress had committed a mistake originally, they ought to correct it.

Mr. BOON had voted against this project originally, but having received the books under the former resolution, he thought it would hardly be fair to withhold that from the new members which he had once received the benefit of. He thought, however, it ought to be restricted to the present members, those now in the seats or otherwise, in case of death or vacancy, several copies might be furnished for the representation of a single district.

On the subject of an exhausted or bankrupt treasury, which had been brought into review, Mr. B. trusted that those who had voted for the suspension of the fourth instalment of deposite with the States would not be again questioned for it, when they were now told (by Mr. Bond) by those who complained of that suspension, that the Treasury was absolutely bankrupt, for if such was its condition, there was nothing to pay it with.

Mr. B. added that he would move an amendment to the effect he had indicated.

The CHAIR remarked that it would not be in order till the pending amendment had been disposed of.

Mr. RARIDEN inquired of Mr. BOND, if under the influence of the opinions he had expressed, he had allowed himself to accept the books ordered under the former resolutions of the House.

Mr. BOND would state frankly, that the books having been sent to his lodgings, he had sent them home, and should do so again, unless under some general order to return them, which he should willingly yield obedience to; still he was opposed to the principle, always had been, and should continue to be so.

Mr. RARIDEN had, to the best of his belief, inserted no book in the resolution which had not been ordered before.

Mr. TILLINGHAST was in favor of equality in regard to sources of information furnished at the public expense. He held it to be for the interest of the constituents that the representatives should be in possession of the acts and doings of the Government at all periods.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, sent the following amendment to the table, giving notice that he should move it when the present amendment was disposed of.

Resolved, That the late members of the House of Representatives of the 23d and 24th Congress, who have received, or are entitled to receive books, under the resolutions of the 23d and 24th Congress, are hereby directed and required to place them in the Library of Congress for the use of their successors, who shall have the right to use them whilst members, and during the sessions of Congress, and who shall replace them in the Library for the use of their successors; and said books shall be thus kept for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, and to be used and replaced in the Library of Congress from time to time as aforesaid. [The books were named in the amendment.]

Mr. McKAY raised the question of order, that this resolution, involving a distinct appropriation of money, should be committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The CHAIR ruled against the point, but said that it might be used as an argument to the House.

Mr. McKAY contended that no proposition for paying money could be authorized without being committed. The fact of the contingent bill not being passed, rather strengthened his point.

Mr. McK's remarks were interrupted by the special order, being the case of the

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Mississippi Election case, the question pending being as follows:

Mr. BRONSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to their seats in the House as such.

The question pending being on the motion of Mr. BELL, who on yesterday moved to amend by striking out all the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows: "That the resolution of this House of the 3d October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material to a correct decision of the question presented, and the same is hereby rescinded."

Resolved, further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Mississippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such.

Mr. PENNYBACKER resumed and concluded his remarks from yesterday, in reply to Mr. PRENTISS. He entered into an elaborate and critical examination of the arguments adduced by the latter, and contended that there was not the slightest ground whereon the contestants could rest their claim. [Want of room prevents our giving even an outline of his speech.]

Mr. MAURY rose and stated, that it had been his intention to submit some remarks upon this question, but, as there appeared to be some disposition to take the question, he would now yield the floor, if it should be understood that the debate was here to close. If any other gentlemen had a desire of addressing the House, they would intimate their intention now; and, if no gentleman did so, he would yield and permit the question to be taken.

Mr. BRONSON said, as a member of the Committee of Elections, he should feel it to be his duty to address a few remarks to the House, before the question should be taken. He should promise, however, that his remarks should be brief.

Mr. LEGARE, also intimated his intention of addressing the House for a short time.

Mr. MAURY then declared his determination to make some remarks on the subject, but gave way to

Mr. SHIELDS, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

[Omitted in the proceedings of yesterday.]

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petition of the heirs of Col. John Holcomb, and the petition of the heirs of Lieut. William Boyer.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted.

Mr. TIPTON, on leave, introduced a bill fixing the compensation of officers of the army employed on duty in the military bureaus; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The resolution submitted by Mr. ROBBINS, directing the Secretary to purchase, for the use of each new Senator, a copy of Gales and Seaton's American State Papers, and copies of certain publications on the subject of the public lands, was taken up, and after some remarks from Messrs. KING and ROBBINS, was laid on the table.

PRE-EMPTIONS TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

The bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, was taken up, as the unfinished business.

Mr. WEBSTER said he would call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a subject not necessarily connected with the bill, but of great importance. It was the propriety of making some provision in the bill to settle questions arising at the General Land Office, and the local land offices, with respect to the mode of finally deciding on disputed land titles. He would suggest to the chairman of the committe, (Mr. WALKER,) whether a provision should not be made to give to the courts of the United States, in the States, competent jurisdiction over all disputed land titles, arising not only under the pre-emption laws, but in all other cases. He though if the circuit or district courts were authorized to entertain jurisdiction over the matter at home, a great deal of trouble would be saved, both here and there; and the advantage of uniformity in practice and decision would be obtained. He did not purpose to offer any amendment himself, as he did not deem it essential to the bill, which he supposed, constituted as the Senate was, must pass; but he threw out these suggestions to the chairman of the committee for his consideration while the bill was pending. Under the bill, some such provision being necessary, it would be as well to be introduced now as at a future time.

Mr. WALKER replied that he would like to take more time to consider this suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, particularly as that gentleman seemed to think that this jurisdiction should extend not only to pre-emption claims, but to other cases arising out of disputed land titles. He could not say whether it would not be better to provide for such cases by a general law. He had not made up his mind fully on this subject as yet. One of the difficulties which presented themselves to him was, the expense which would be incurred by carrying conflicting cases before the United States courts. The parties in general were poor, residing at a distance from the courts; they would be compelled to procure strictly legal evidence on the various points to be determined by the courts, and to employ lawyers, all of which would involve an expense too heavy for the majority of them to bear; and in many cases the entire value of the quarter section would be swept away by this expensive mode of litigation. Now he had no objection to a provision extending this jurisdiction with the consent of parties; but to compel one party to go before these courts without the consent of the other, would involve a heavy cost, which he would hesitate long before he would consent to impose on them. He should also have no objection to an appeal in the last resort to either of the United States courts, where either party was dissatisfied with the decision of the General Land Office. He threw out these suggestions to the Senator from Massachusetts, and probably might hereafter consent to some provisions, sufficiently matured and guarded, that would meet the views of the gentleman.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that his object was general—to give a direct power to the courts of the United States to entertain jurisdiction over all disputed cases whatever. The gentleman's greatest objection appeared to be founded on the expense to be incurred by carrying these cases before the United States courts. Now, the first inquiry was, was there any existing mode short of judicature by which these conflicting cases could be settled? Here were two conflicting cases. A and B dispute the right to a patent, and the President decides in favor of A. Now, did that end the case? No, surely. It must be made the subject of private litigation; and the only difference was, if the two parties were inhabitants of the same State, they might avail themselves of the State courts. Now, all the objections as to expense, distance, and legal strictness of evidence, existed as well with regard to the State courts as to the circuit and district courts, and it was as easy to try the cases in the latter as in the former.

One great object (Mr. W. said) was to have a process which should be uniform in the decision of these important cases; and whether this would not be easier obtained in the United States courts than in the various courts of the States, where various forms and opinions prevailed, and where the only mode of bringing the cases before the United States court would be by the circuitous process of a writ of error to the Supreme Court, was submitted to the judgment of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama did not know what views he might entertain with respect to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, were it made in a distinct form; but he trusted that it would not, at all events, be made as an amendment to embarrass the bill under discussion. The proposition was a new one, and some views with respect to it which had been taken by the chairman of the committee were worthy of the deliberate consideration of the Senate. He referred to the great expense attending this mode of litigation, as presenting the strongest objections to it. He himself was not aware that there was any objection to the jurisdiction of the State courts over these disputed land cases; all of them had chancery jurisdiction, as well as law; and although there might not be the same uniformity of process and decision in them as there was in the United States courts, yet they, without doubt, dispensed justice as surely and as cheap. There was another view to be taken of this question. Suppose both parties were residents of the same State, as would most generally be the case, and no question involving the constitutionality or validity of a law of the United States, could jurisdiction, in such cases, be given to the Circuit Courts of the United States? He (Mr. C.) was not prepared himself to say, conclusively, what might be his opinion on that subject. His attention, he said, had not for some time past been directed to such questions, and, without giving an opinion, he threw out the suggestion for the consideration of the Senator from Massachusetts.

At all events, though he had not given due consideration to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, he trusted that it would not be incorporated into a bill intended to secure their homes and improvements to the meritorious and industrious cultivators of the public domain. If the Senator believed that a provision of this nature was important, he hoped that he would introduce it in a separate bill, and he, for one, pledged himself to give it the most attentive consideration. There seemed to him, however, to be no such great difficulty about the matter. These cases were ordinarily determined here, in the last resort, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the aid of the Solicitor of that Department, and with a reference, in cases of difficulty, to the Attorney General. No great complaints of this mode of decision had ever been made, at least, very few, Mr. C. said, in his State. Whenever difficulties occurred, the practice of the Commissioner of the General Land Office was to suspend the decision till a report was had from the local land office, and all the parties were fully heard on the subject. Then the Commissioner, who has for some years past been a lawyer, and certainly always ought to be, decides with the assistance of the best legal counsel.

This mode of decision, Mr. C. believed, had generally given satisfaction, was the most convenient to the parties, and attended with little expense. Mr. C. concluded by repeating the hope that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts would be brought forward in a distinct form, and not permitted to embarrass a measure of such importance as the present, and one which Mr. C. wished determined on its own merits. If sent to the committee to which he belonged, it would receive the most prompt and attentive consideration, and be decided on by the Senate with reference to its own intrinsic merits.

Mr. WEBSTER did not propose to offer any amendment, nor did he intend to bring in any bill; but he believed that before another year passed, they would be called on to create a new tribunal to settle these conflicting land cases, and the course he suggested was to obviate the difficulty by what seemed to him the easiest mode. Now, as these questions would arise under the laws of the United States, he supposed there was no doubt of the power of Congress to give the United States courts jurisdiction over them. This had been done in many cases, and Mr. W. cited the jurisdiction given to the United States courts in cases arising out of the collection of the customs.

Mr. WALKER concurred with the Senator from Massachusetts in some of the views expressed by him, but, at the same time, thought it would be better to have another bill on the subject referred to the appropriate committee. He himself, if no other Senator did, would bring the subject before the Senate. He had no doubt of the power of Congress to give to the courts of the United States jurisdiction over all cases arising under the laws or Constitution of the United States, and any cases involving a construction of a statute of the United States, or at least involving a title to property derived from the public domain under a law of Congress. As at present advised, he should have no objection to a resolution directing the Judiciary Committee to bring in a bill to permit the parties to resort to the courts of the United States at once, instead of first going to the State courts, and then coming by appeal to the Supreme Court. He thought, however, the matter was one of importance and great delicacy, and should be provided for in a separate bill.

Mr. YOUNG observed that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts would necessarily involve an expense that would be ruinous. He considered that all the parties were well protected as the law now was. The register of the local land office first decided on the claim, and if the parties were dissatisfied, they applied to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who had the opinion of the Attorney General to aid him in making up his decision. Now he would ask if the parties were not as well protected by this mode of decision, as if they resorted to the circuit or district courts; and an appeal to the Supreme Court he looked upon as involving an expense too great to be borne in most of the cases? He recollected a case mentioned to him by the late Senator Kane—a case involving the value of a single slave—cost, by being carried up to the Supreme Court, upwards of five hundred dollars.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, after some remarks at considerable length, in which he commented on the frauds alleged to have been practised under the pre-emption laws, submitted an amendment to define more accurately the settlement and cultivation necessary to acquire a right to a pre-emption. Mr. C's amendment was to strike out that part of the bill relating to settlement and cultivation, and to insert, in lieu thereof, the following: "by actual residence thereon, on or before the 1st day of December, 1837, and the cultivation of at least one acre in corn, and continued residence and cultivation to this time."

Mr. WALKER had no objection to defining more accurately the habitation and cultivation; but he hoped the gentleman would not confine the cultivation to corn, as that would exclude a great many meritorious cultivators who did not grow that article.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he had named corn particularly, because the bill professing to provide for the poor man, who cultivated the soil for the support of his family, this kind of grain would embrace the cultivation of all persons of that class. The very first thing a poor man naturally, did if he intended a bona fide settlement, was, after building his cabin, to plant corn for the support of his family. This seemed so consistent with the natural course of conduct of a bona fide settler in a new country, that in the first laws passed by the Legislature of Virginia for the benefit of that class of persons, the previous planting and cultivation of corn was made an indispensable requisition to obtain a title to the land.

Mr. WALKER contended that it would be invidious to require that in all the States of the Union the cultivation suited to Virginia should be the indispensable prerequisite to the acquiring a right to a pre-emption. He hoped the gentleman would not adhere to this branch of the amendment. Let him go (said Mr. W.) to the banks of the Mississippi, and he will find hundreds of settlers who plant cotton the very first year, and buy all their corn from the constituents of the gentleman. In Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi, the settler will plant his twenty and thirty acres of cotton and not one grain of corn; and why? Because in some years cotton bore such prices that it was considered most lucrative to grow nothing else. He submitted to the gentleman from Kentucky whether it would not be most for the interest of his constituents to leave the matter of cultivation to the settler himself, and let him, if he finds it to his interest, buy his corn.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested to the Senator from Kentucky, who he no doubt had only in view the defining more strictly an actual settlement and cultivation, to modify his amendment by striking out "corn," leaving the nature of the cultivation to be determined by the land office. As the Senator from Mississippi had remarked, it would be extremely hard to confine the cultivation to corn, as many cultivators bought all they used, though he (Mr. C.) regarded it as a very injudicious way of farming, and one that no doubt resulted very much to the advantage of the constituents of the gentleman from Kentucky, as there were times when every bushel of corn carried down the Mississippi was worth from a dollar to a dollar and sixty-five cents per bushel.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then modified his amendment by adding "wheat and cotton."

Mr. KING intended to have voted for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky without going further. The general term of "corn" included wheat and all other small grain as much as it did "Indian corn," and he was perfectly satisfied with this designation of the degree of cultivation required. He knew of no instance himself where a poor man made a settlement that he did not plant Indian corn the first year. Mr. K. believed that many frauds had been practiced under the old law by individuals obtaining their pre-emptions without sufficient cultivation, and that they ought, in the present one, to define the degree of requisite cultivation so clearly as to admit of no doubt. His object was, in good faith, to give to men who settled on the public domain their homes, and their little improvements, to enable them to support their families, and further than that he was not willing to go. He was not willing by any loose or indefinite phraseology to enable persons to go through the country and take up the best lands under a pre-emption for the purpose of selling to others at a profit. His object was to benefit the honest, industrious settler and cultivator only, and he wished it to be so clearly expressed in the bill.

Mr. WALKER said it might be true that corn was raised in Alabama, but he hoped they would not on that account seek to deprive settlers in other States from raising such crops as they conceived most advantageous. He was well aware that, high up the streams in that State where gentlemen lived, they were obliged to raise corn, because they could not purchase it from the surrounding country. But he had known repeated instances in Mississippi, where settlers had planted cotton the first year, and purchased their corn. Because the course pursued in Alabama varied from that of Mississippi, would it be right to compel her settlers to adopt it? If the amendment prevailed, it would exclude so large a portion of settlers in his State as would compel him to vote against the bill.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky observed, that he now learned with regret, that in many parts of Mississippi they did not raise corn. Now he would advise them to do it at once, for of all the blessings which Providence had conferred upon man, he looked upon this as the greatest. But the great object of his friend and colleague in limiting the cultivation to corn was the facility of its culture, and the abundance of its yield, in the new and fertile lands of the West, rendering it the most natural crop for a poor man to begin with. This reminded him of a glowing account, given by an old friend of his, of one of the great grain counties of Kentucky. His friend described the land as producing twenty barrels of corn to the acre, with planting and cultivation together. If planted only without ploughing, he said it would produce ten; but if it was neither planted nor ploughed, it would yield a very tolerable crop of five barrels to the acre. This, however, was no fiction, for he had seen with his own eyes, as good a crop of corn growing in a field where there had been neither planting nor ploughing, as was to be found in a great number of the cornfields on both sides of the Potomac. He must explain, Mr. C. said, how this happened, or incur the imputation of having told what was incredible. The corn was growing in an enclosed field, where cattle had been fed, and sprung up from the grain wasted by them in feeding. With respect to the mode of cultivation to be provided for in the bill, he did not approve of limiting it to corn. He thought the cultivation ought to include small grain, as well as cotton and sugar cane.

Mr. LYON suggested the addition of potatoes, an esculent vegetable, and very much relied on in Michigan.

Mr. BENTON said he was opposed to the amendments proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) and should notice them before he sat down. His first object was to repel the imputation of fraud which had been so industriously lavished upon western settlers. He denied, out and out, the justice of this imputation. He denied, out and out, the truth of these stale fabrications, generally invented by speculators, and worn threadbare forty years ago. The story of the catnip seed—of corn in a spring of water for the spring of the year—of Johnny Black and Billy Black, meaning negroes—with all the rest of such stories with which the Senate had been entertained on former occasions, were all inventions to prejudice the settlers of the new countries. He knew those settlers well. He went among them in Tennessee near forty years ago, and had been among them all over the West, from that time to the present. He knew them well. There was not, upon the face of the earth a better population. They were the hardy pioneers whose meritorious exertions gave value to the country. Their object was to cultivate the land which they settled on; and the cultivators of the soil had been admitted in all ages, and in all countries, to constitute the most meritorious body of citizens. All the Western States had been settled by these hardy pioneers, and their posterity is now among the most valuable of their citizens. British travellers and British reviews had stigmatized the frontier settlers of the United States; but that was their vocation, and nothing better was expected of them; but Senators in Congress should not repeat things of the truth of which they have no knowledge, and which, in fact, are so unfounded.

We are told by some (said Mr. B.) that the pre-emption system ought to be put down—that it ought to cease—that no more pre-emptions should be granted. On the contrary, Mr. B. was for preserving and perpetuating it. The system was as old as the Government, and he hoped would continue as long as the Government had public lands to be sold. What is a pre-emption? It is nothing but a right of first purchase. It is no donation—it is no gift—it is no gratuitous distribution of the land. It is only a privilege in the man who has settled upon the land, to buy it at Government price; and that price is $1 25 per acre. The pre-emption merely exempts the settler from the competition of speculators at the auction sales, and these auction sales have in reality produced nothing for the public Treasury. The auction system has been the fruitful source of combinations among capitalists, and of oppression to settlers, but has produced nothing to the Treasury. There is now official evidence of this fact; for a return of the Commissioner of the General Land Office shows that on all the lands sold for fifteen years past, to wit: from 1823 to 1837 inclusive, there is but a gain of two cents and a half per acre on the minimum price. To be precise, it is not two and a half cents, but two cents and nine-twentieths of a cent. The whole number of acres sold in that time is 59,410,556 acres, and the amount received is $75,723,102, which gives an average of $1 27 9-20 per acre. Thus the Government has gained nothing by the auction system; and of the two systems he would prefer to see the auction system abolished, rather than the pre-emption system.

Mr. B. said he was opposed to this amendment, and to all provisions about cultivation. There was no object now in requiring cultivation. Formerly, in the infant settlements of the country, it was an object to induce a settler to raise a crop, as that crop was necessary to sustain the forthcoming emigration; but now it is no object. Settlement is now the object. It is the settler against the speculator that now claims attention; and all we want is evidence of the intention to be a settler; and building a house, and preparing for cultivation, constitutes that evidence as fully as actual cultivation. All he wanted in the bill was residence—a settlement—a house and a commencement to improve and on this he was willing to grant the pre-emption right. He objected to cultivation as a prerequisite, and would wish to see every present settler on the public lands allowed the privilege.

Mr. B. had spoken of the meritorious character of the western cultivators, and a document on the table gave evidence of it. It was a document from the Treasury Department, in answer to a call from the Senator for the amounts of specie received and disbursed by the Federal Government since the stoppage of the banks in May last. That document showed that there had been received from customs, during that period, no more than the sum of $1,325,317, of which $800,000 had been paid back to the merchants, leaving but $525,317 for the whole amount of revenue received in specie from the custom-houses in that period; while the same document shows that there has been received from the land offices, in hard money, during the same time, the large sum of $3,474,735, not one dollar of which has been refunded to farmers for debentures; for that is a case in which the doctrine of debenture does not apply. Here there is proof of their merit. The banks shut up; the merchants ceased to pay specie; the Government was in danger of being reduced entirely to the use of irredeemable paper; but the farmers, the cultivators, the settlers, had poured out their hard money to the Government. In spite of the stoppage of the banks, they continued to pay hard money for public land, and actually purchased as much as ever had been bought before the two years of speculation on bank facilities. They paid three and a half millions in eight months, since the stoppage of the banks, which is at the rate of five millions per annum; and five millions per annum is more than the lands ever brought previous to the two years of speculation—the years 1835 and 1836—speculations which the most glorious Treasury order put an end to. That order put an end to bank-facility speculations. It expelled the speculators from the field, and saved the lands for cultivators. These cultivators paid three and a half millions in hard money after the stoppage of the banks last year, and they will pay double or treble that amount this year. They will pay double or treble that amount this year; for the new surveys, withheld from sale by the wisdom and firmness of General Jackson in 1836, will come into market in 1838; and the farmers will buy them, and pay for them in hard money, whether the banks resume or not. These meritorious settlers are not dependants of banks. They do not hang upon bank favors; they do not live upon bank facilities. They cultivate the earth; they raise the food which sustains the life of man and beast; they work hard, and they love hard money, and are wise enough to demand it, and have it; and then they are patriotic enough to give it to their Government for its lands. Mr. B. expatiated upon the wisdom of General Jackson, both in issuing the most glorious Treasury order, which stopped the sale of the lands for bank notes which cannot be redeemed; and also for withholding all the new surveys from market in 1836. By these two measures he had saved many tens of millions of acres of fresh lands from falling into the hands of speculators for the notes of banks which suspended payment as soon as the Treasury was full of their notes; and he had reserved all these new lands for farmers, and for a resource to the country during the failure of the banks, and the merchants, to pay hard money. The only resource of the Government for hard money has been, for eight months past, and may be for a year or two to come, in these settlers on the public lands; and a safe resource it is; for if all the new surveys are brought into market this year, eight or ten millions of acres will be sold, and hard money will be paid for it. Mr. B. did not take another view of this large specie payment for land made since the banks stopped, but every body must see in that effect the highest proof of the Treasury order, and also the highest proof of the wisdom of the Divorce bill—that bill which goes to separate the Government from the banks, and to exclude their paper from its Treasury. It is an omnipotent fact to prove that the Government can collect all its revenues in gold and silver; for, when farmers, who handle comparatively but little money, can buy more lands and pay in hard money during the stoppage of the banks, than ever was done before the two years of speculation, what cannot be done when the banks resume?

Mr. B. did not enter into invidious comparisons; his object was to defend, and not to attack—to defend the settlers in the new States from unjust, unfounded, and unjustifiable imputations upon them; but it was impossible to look at the document to which he had referred, without seeing how little the merchants had done, and how much the farmers had done towards sustaining the Government in the loss of its revenues by the banks. The farmers had paid three and a half millions in hard dollars since the bank suspensions; the merchants, after deducting the amount refunded in debentures, had only paid about half a million. Yet the merchants were the class to which we grant every favor, while the poor privilege of pre-emption—a mere protection against speculators, is here vehemently denied them! We keep up ambassadors all over the civilized world for the benefit of commerce; we send fleets, and ships of war, into all seas for its protection; we have brought home indemnities in gold from France and Naples for the benefit of the merchants; we have given them delays on their bonds; we have done all for them they can ask, yet they have paid only half a million of hard dollars to the Government in its distress, while these farmers, who have paid three and a half millions in the same time, are to be deprived, if possible, of the humble privilege of the right of pre-emption.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he would not contend with the gentleman about the glory of the Treasury order, or the wisdom of the immortal Jackson; they were subjects that might very safely be left to the kind and indulgent feelings of the Senator from Missouri. With regard to the amendment, however, which he had the honor to offer, he must say that it was only intended to show who were actual settlers. Nothing of a stigmatising or reproachful nature against them had fallen from his lips; but he did say that imposters had come in and wrested from the actual settler his claim. He was satisfied in his own mind that numerous frauds had taken place under these pre-emption laws, and that persons had by perjury and by subornation of perjury secured to themselves lands to which they had no claim. The object of his amendment was, then, to make the claimant give evidence of a bona fide intention to reside on the land, by raising a crop and otherwise improving it; and unless it was intended to allow these persons to take possession of the public domain, whether they cultivate it or not, where could there be raised any objection to the system he proposed? Various precautionary measures had been concurred in at the former session, and why not now, when he asked to guard the bill at so small a point?

Mr. KING said he could not suppose the Senator from Missouri alluded to any remarks of his, which made it, in his opinion, necessary for him to vindicate the character of the settlers upon the public lands. [Mr. BENTON said certainly not.] He, (Mr. K.) from the position he occupied, from the decided support he had ever given to pre-emption laws, was the last man who could be suspected of casting censure on the settlers on the public lands as a class. That frauds had been perpetrated under the pre-emption law of 1830, was not to be questioned. In legislating, therefore, on this subject, we should carefully guard against all possibility of fraud. Would this be to cast censure upon actual settlers? Certainly not. As well might it be objected to your revenue laws, that to require oaths was to cast censure on the whole body of the merchants of the country.

Mr. K. here stated the rules required by the land office, to prove the settlement and cultivation, etc. The facts required by these rules were necessary to be proved before the claimant can get the pre-emption; and this was done by order of the Department, to guard against persons getting the choice spots of land without being settlers and cultivators. He stated that he was prepared to vote for any amendment which would define distinctly what should be the kind of settlement and cultivation to entitle the claimant to a pre-emption. Such was the design of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky. Include more articles of cultivation, if necessary, but let them be distinctly stated. Although the pre-emptioners paid nearly as much as the average price received for the public domain, still the laws operated as a bounty to them, for they got the choice lands at the minimum price. If it was not a favor conferred on them, why did they ask for it? Why not take their chance with the other purchasers of the public lands? He wished to secure to these men the particular spots selected for their cultivation—to guard them against being turned out of their houses, and driven into the woods, by the heartless speculators, who had more capital than themselves. He was not disposed to lay any unnecessary restrictions on those persons who settled in good faith on the public lands where the Indian title had been extinguished, whether their cultivation was in Indian corn, cotton, or any other crop by which they supported their families, and he hoped gentlemen would extend it to all the usual crops. In guarding against the possibility of fraud, he should be sorry for the Senate to suppose that he was diposed to stigmatize as fraudulent those who settled on the public lands; for if he did so, he would stigmatize nine-tenths of the most respectable people of Alabama, for that country was principally settled by that class of persons.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, thought that the more the privilege of pre-emption was restricted, the more danger there was of doing injustice to many meritorious persons. The honorable Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CRITTENDEN) ascribed too much importance to the charges of fraud which had been rung throughout the country by interested persons. Now, what had been the result of these charges? A special commission had been appointed by the Treasury Department to go into the country, where they were said to have been committed, and they had found, as Mr. C. understood, only sixteen cases of frauds having been committed under the old pre-emption laws. Now, he asked, if this small number of cases was to operate as a restriction to the numerous cases of meritorious claimants? As his friend from Mississippi remarked they had, after the fullest investigation, obtained the proof that only sixteen cases of frauds had been discovered; while on the other hand, the benefits conferred on a vast body of our meritorious fellow-citizens, had resulted in no loss to the Government. It had been found that the average price received for the public lands, in 1828 and 1829, amounted to only one cent more than the price paid by the pre-emptioner; the average price of the lands sold in these years, being only one dollar and twenty-six cents per acre. This was before any general pre-emption law was ever passed. Again, the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, made eight years ago, showed that in three preceding years, in three of the States, (Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri,) the average excess amount to only six mills over the minimum price; and on this state of things was predicated the first general pre-emption law.

The few frauds that had been discovered upon investigation, were sufficient to show that it was not necessary to throw around this bill new restrictions. He thought the honorable Senator from Kentucky had not sufficiently looked at the bill, and the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office under the old law, which this was intended to revive. Abundant power was given to provide against those difficulties, which this amendment was intended to avoid. Mr. C. then read from the 3d section of the act of 1830 as follows:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That prior to any entries being made under the privileges given by this act, proof of settlement or improvement shall be made, to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which such lands may lie, agreeably to the rules to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for that purpose," &c.

The application made under this law to the register and receiver accorded with the rules established by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; one of which was, that there must be a house built on the land, and another that there must be a sufficient cultivation, the description of which must necessarily be left to the discretion of the register and receiver. Further: in the last resort, an appeal is had to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Now, he would submit to the Senator from Kentucky, whether this was not restriction enough, and whether, if they went further, there would not be danger of excluding many meritorious claimants. One restriction was adopted on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee yesterday, which was with regard to the extinction of the Indian title before allowing a pre-emption; and another, he was sorry to say, had been incorporated in the bill by its best friends, excluding what are called floats, merely because sixteen cases of fraud had arisen under them. He was sorry that this last restriction had been introduced, because many meritorious persons would, where two or more were settled on the same quarter section, be compelled, in the division of it, to take indifferent land, and too small a quantity, instead of being permitted to go and select the quantity to which they were entitled elsewhere. As he had observed before, it would be found that, during eighteen years of the operation of the cash system, not more than two and a half cents per acre above the minimum price had been received by the Government. Now would any man say that it was an unjust policy to accord the same privilege to the industrious settler who opened and cleared a new country, and by whose labors the value of the public domain was enhanced, as to those who purchased for the purpose of speculation? He thought that the same indulgence should be granted to the settler, whether he cultivated corn or any thing else. In his section of the country it had been no uncommon thing for combinations of men to engage in speculation, and sometimes force hush money from the settlers for their homes and improvements; and at other times to purchase up large districts at the public sales, and afterwards have auctions of their own and sell off at a large profit. He had seen this, and seen men driven with their families from their homes by these heartless speculators whom gentlemen proposed to encourage by these harsh restrictions. It was this description of fraud which he wished to put down, and confine the public domain to the cultivators alone. He could not believe that it would be for the advantage of any State of the Union, or that it would add to its strength or resources, that the public domain should be monopolized by speculators. It seemed to him that the evils of speculation had been so completely shown in this discussion, that the honorable Senator would see fit not to press his amendment.

Mr. WEBSTER thought the bill ought to be guarded in every possible manner, or the whole object of the law would be defeated. It was not unfrequently that pride put on the air of humility, and there might be those in the character of humble pioneers of the West availing themselves of the privileges of this law, to the injury of the actual settler. He thought that personal residence was the best evidence of the settler's intention; cultivation might be left in a general sense, or else made so particular as not to be mistaken.

Mr. WALKER read some extracts from the circulars of the General Land Office, showing the rules prescribing the nature of the habitation and cultivation necessary to acquire a right to a pre-emption; among which was the rule requiring a dwelling-house, a suitable fence and cultivation, and excluding any settlement by means of agents or overseers.

Mr. CLAY said, in no shape in which the bill could be placed, could he be brought to vote for it. The whole pre-emption system was a violation of all law, and an encouragement to persons to go on the public lands and take the choicest portions of them, as suited their interests or their inclinations. He, at least, would not be deterred from opposing it by any menace or threat which might be thrown out. He stood there as the representative of the whole Union, and, as such, should contend against a system which had for its object to take from the Government the possession of these lands to throw them into the hands of the speculators.

He held in his hand a document, which, recent as it was, seemed to have been lost sight of by the advocates of the bill. Gentlemen had argued, again and again, that the Government had lost nothing by the pre-emption system, and calculations had been read from the Land Office to show that the whole difference obtained in the amount received for the last fifteen years did not make a difference of more than two or two and a half cents an acre on the average. He (Mr. C.) was aware how easy it was to have accounts made by those charged with that branch of this business; but he would take occasion to read from a report of a late commissioner, (Gov. Brown,) a man whom he believed more conversant with the public lands than any other in this country, which clearly showed that great losses were sustained by the Government; that the system was full of abominable fraud, alike scandalous to the Government that countenanced it and infamous to the perpetrators of it. Mr. C. said he did not mean to denounce all who had availed themselves of the pre-emption law—far be it from him to do so. There were doubtless many worthy and excellent men among them; but he did denounce the whole system of pre-emption as a fraudulent, heartless, scandalous, abominable speculation (Here Mr. C. read from the report of Mr. Brown the late commissioner, and discanted at length upon the information contained in the report.) As soon as it was ascertained that a Territory was to be established, there was one wild precipitous rush to get possession of all the choice spots of land, to be claimed under a pre-emption right, by men who overawed honest purchasers, forbidding them under pains and penalties to interfere with their locations. It was in this way that Government was despoiled of her lands by lawless and violent men. Against all such proceedings, he would speak as long as God gave him strength to do so. These people should be kept from the public land—they destroyed all fair competition in the purchase, subjecting the Government to great losses, and the honest purchaser to inconvenience and extortion.

Mr. WALKER commented on the report of the late Commissioner of the General Land Office, referred to by the Senator from Kentucky, which he characterized as wholly incorrect, and founded on calumny and misrepresentation. It was partly on the representations of an anonymous letter writer, who had charged him (Mr. W.) with being the holder of half a million's worth of pre-emptions in Arkansas, (and he had conclusively shown that he never owned a dollar's worth,) that Mr. Commissioner Brown founded this report, stigmatizing the honest settlers of the West with having obtained their pre-emptions by fraudulent practices. Another letter writer was the district attorney, who said that three hundred and fifty fraudulent floats had been laid on the route of Atchafalaya railroad. And here, said Mr. W. is the official report made by the visiter of the General Government to the land office, which refutes the charge. There, Mr. Brown was corrected by his own agent, who stated that it was not true that three hundred and fifty floats had been laid there.

Thus (said Mr. W.) when you look at all the complaints against this pre-emption system, you will find that they were made by persons interested, like this district attorney. These interested speculators wished to get the farms of the settlers at a few cents above the minimum price; and therefore they were so ready to oppose obstacles in the way of the execution of the pre-emption laws. Mr. W. replied at length to Mr. CLAY, reviewing and commenting on the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office alluded to, and showing that it was little to be relied on.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky was aware how unequal the contest was. The determination to push this bill through, by the majority, was evinced by the manner in which its provisions were eulogised as equitable to all, and specially calculated to give homes to the poor man; but with regard to some insinuations which had been thrown out, of a "grasping spirit," he begged leave to repel the charge, and would throw it back to where it belonged, viz: on the new States. He denied that any such feeling was evinced by the old States; that grant after grant had been given to the new States for internal improvements, for endowing colleges, and for other purposes calculated to promote their interests.

It was but the other day that Michigan asked a grant of near half a million of acres. Where was the grasping spirit connected with the distribution law? That measure proposed to leave the land system where it found it, under which we had gone on so well and for so many years. It proposed simply to distribute the proceeds of the sales among the old States as well as the new, giving to the latter a per centage of some 10 or 15 per cent. for purposes of education, &c.; where was the grasping spirit there?

Insinuations, too, had been thrown out against the officer from whose report he had just read statements in relation to the pre-emption system. Had not that officer been appointed a minister to a foreign court, and to other high and responsible stations, by "the immortal Jackson?" And yet he was not to be credited here, because his reports were adverse to the views of gentlemen! If they would not credit the documents of their own officer, who would they credit? The Senator from Mississippi says that of all these cases alluded to in that report, there were but nineteen fraudulent cases; and that out of them, the district attorney from whom the information had been derived had five. Mr. C. said he should like to know who the agent was that had been sent to investigate. Might he not, on the other hand, been interested in some ten or fifteen cases out of the nineteen? The fact was, that the whole pre-emption system putrefied and corrupted all it touched. Mr. C. alluded to the Miami reserve; lands worth from $10 to $40 per acre had been intruded upon by lawless men, in violation of the rights of the Government; and yet these "poor, honest settlers" were to have the rights of pre-emption. What right had these men to the public lands? By what power did they seize upon and rob the United States of their possessions? As well might they seize upon the dollars in the public Treasury; on the forts, arsenals, and public ships, as on the public lands. Mr. C. read from an Indiana paper a debate in relation to this reserve, where the system of pre-emption was investigated. He had some experience in relation to these matters in Kentucky; and of all the numerous pre-emptionists who had lived in that State, he knew of but one single individual who had remained on his quarter section. The auction system was a wise and cautious system; it gave a full and fair chance for competition in the purchase of the public lands, by which the Government was benefited, and the individual also.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama would say one word in regard to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, alluded to by the chairman of the committee. He understood that the Commissioner had represented that we had lost in a single year three millions of dollars by the operation of the pre-emption laws. On this subject he wished to call the attention of the Senate to the documentary facts, and especially that of the Senator from Kentucky, to the assertion that the lands would sell for more at public auction than they brought under the pre-emption laws. If gentlemen would look at the documents on their tables, they would find that in 1822 the sales amounted to but three cents more than the minimum price; that in 1823 the excess was only five cents, and in 1824 the excess was only two cents. Now Mr. C. asked were there any pre-emption laws in those years? No. At that time no general pre-emption law had ever been enacted. Again: in two subsequent years we find (said Mr. C.) a falling off greater than before; for in 1828 the excess was only one cent, and in 1829 the same. He hoped the Government was honestly administered in 1828. The Senator from Kentucky himself would be able to answer on that score;* and yet it was found that in those years the average excess was only one cent. Was not this fact sufficient to put down the assumption that the pre-emption laws had diminished the sales and the amount received from the public lands. In 1836 no excess was found, though half a million of acres had been offered for sale at public auction. These facts were incontrovertible, were on record, and conclusively showed that the report was wrong in asserting that the operation of the pre-emption laws had diminished the receipts from public lands three millions. The Senator from Kentucky had seized on an apparent discrepancy between the Message of the President and the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with a view to excite prejudice against those officers, and the measure under consideration. Mr. C. said it would not be very difficult to reconcile this seeming contradiction.

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) to accomplish the purpose alluded to, had referred to a single sentence in the President's message, in which he remarks: Upon a "critical examination, it is found that the lands sold at the public sales, since the introduction of cash payments, in 1820, have produced, on an average, the nett revenue of only six cents an acre more than the minimum Government price." The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office embraces all descriptions of sales, public and private, at auction, and under the pre-emption laws, from the commencement of the cash system, on the 1st of July, 1820, to the 30th of Sept. 1837, a period of more than seventeen years—and makes the general average excess above the minimum price only two cents and 4-5ths of a cent. per acre. And, said Mr. C. the message of the President not only referred to public sales alone, but it was sent to the two Houses of the 5th of December last, more than a month before the date of the Commissioner's report. That was made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, adopted on the motion of him (Mr. Clay of Alabama) on the 20th of September last; had occupied almost four months in its completion by all the available force of the office; and was the only report, embracing the entire sales under the cash system, which had ever been made. Mr. C. said it was more than likely, too, that the President referred to some isolated period of the system, as shown in in some former report. It certainly referred only to public sales.

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) had also remarked that these pre-emption laws had been made the instruments of the most stupendous frauds. Mr. C. said he would take leave to tell that Senator, with perfect deference, that he was wholly mistaken, and his charge utterly unfounded, as regarded the operation of the system generally. The pre-emption laws had been the most effective instruments to prevent fraud, to save the honest settler and cultivator, and put down the most nefarious and heartless system of specula ion ever devised. Such efforts to defeat bills of this character, Mr. C. said, were not new to him. When he was a member of the House of Representatives, he recollected, on the eve of taking up a bill like the present, documents containing the most injurious imputations and reflections on a portion of the occupants of the public domain, were printed and laid upon the desks of members; but fortunately there were persons present from the district of country implicated, who were able to brand the authors of those documents as interested speculators, and show their allegations to be wholly groundless. What was done in another instance had been shown by his honorable friend, the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Walker.) In that instance the individual making the charge, as Mr. C. understood it, was himself a speculator, and the perpetrator of the fraud.

Sir, said Mr. C. the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) alleges that this bill holds out, and provides bounties for violations of law. What sort of bounties, sir? Is it a bounty to let the man already in possession of a tract of the public land have it at the same price for which you could sell it to another? Is it a bounty to suffer the man who has gone forth into the forest, and by his own labor and industry, opened his farm and built his cabin, to retain possession, and enjoy the fruits of his toil and enterprise, for the same money you would receive from the speculator? Sir, said Mr. C. it is no bounty, and the records of the General Land Office, and the documents on the desks of every Senator, show conclusively that such is not the fact. He said it had already been shown that the general average before the passage of the pre-emption law of May, 1830, (the first general law of the kind,) was no better than it had since been. The cash system commenced in 1820; in 1822, the average price per acre was only $1 28; in 1823, it was only $1 30; in 1824, it was only $1 27; in the years 1828 and 1829, each, it was only $1 26. All this (said Mr. C.) happened before the first pre-emption law was passed, which was not till 1830, and proves the groundlessness of the assumption that this bill gives a bounty.

No, sir, said Mr. C. the bill offers no bounty for violations of law. The naked question which it presents, is, "will you suffer the settler, who has improved and cultivated a little spot of the public domain, to take the limited quantity of one quarter section for the same money that would be received from the speculator, and no less?" It is a bill for the prevention of frauds and speculation, instead of being the instrument of them.

Mr. C. said the auction system, instead of pre-emptions, had been prolific of frauds, which the Senator from Kentucky might well have denounced as "scandalous to Government and to individuals." Such epithets would be much more appropriate to the combinations, who attended auction sales, and bought land merely for speculation, and not for settlement or cultivation. If the Senater were to see a large combination of capitalists in attendance upon an auction land sale, holding their immense capital in terror over the settler, at one time demanding of him a certain sum per acre not to bid against him, and at others deterring competition, purchasing up vast quantities of land at Government price; and, at the close of the Government sale, holdding an auction of their own, and wringing from the hard hands of the laborious cultivator, from two to five dollars per acre profit, and sometimes more, he might find fit subjects for the application of his epithets, of "frauds scandalous to the Government and to individuals." Mr. C. said, as he had intimated on another occasion, he had personally witnessed such transactions as he had described; and it was to prevent their recurrence, and to protect meritorious settlers from such impositions, while it would not lessen the receipts of the Government, that he wished this bill passed.

Mr. C. said he knew the character of the population which constituted the settlers on the public lands; that he had lived amongst them, and had had much intercourse with them, and could inform gentlemen that they were not renegades, vagabonds, or outlaws. As a class, he said, they could boast of as many virtues as any other. Many of them, he knew, were distinguished for their intelligence and respectability; and all were distinguished for their generous hospitality, honest independence, and bold enterprise.

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) had declared that he would not be deterred from the course he had marked out for himself by denunciations, come from whom, or what quarter they might. Mr. C. said he did not know to whom the Senator from Kentucky alluded; but, if that Senator escaped the denunciations of the hardy pioneers and settlers of the West, whom he had charged as violaters of the law, trespassers who had seized upon the public property, and whom he had stigmatized as perpetrators of the most disgraceful frauds, in terms so injurious to their characters and feelings, he would be fortunate indeed. Mr. C. said he knew, from his residence amongst them, how unjust such imputations against the settlers were; and that, if fraud was intended to be suppressed, the most effectual way of attaining the object was by passing the bill before the Senate.

Mr. YOUNG observed that the object of all the members from the new States was to secure to the settlers on the public lands the right of pre-emption to their improvements. Now by the provisions in this bill, and the nature of the amendment, it was declared that the persons to be benefited by it, must not only be settlers, but cultivators also. But where was the necessity of requiring proof of cultivation? Suppose a man settled down as a blacksmith, was not his claim a meritorious one, and was he and his family to be driven from his improvements because he supported himself and them by laboring at the forge, instead of the plough? Suppose a man settled down on a prairie, (and there were hundreds of such cases,) and broke up the land, and put in his wheat, without enclosing it; was he to lose his labor and improvements, because he did not make his fence within the time required? Mr. Y. held it only necessary that the claimant should be an occupant; and that to require cultivation would, in a number of cases, produce great hardship. Those who lived in the new States knew that hundreds of the poorer class of persons went there without the means of cultivating. Many of them having large families of children, built their little log cabins, and were compelled to labor for their support. He prayed gentlemen, therefore, not to exclude this numerous class of meritorious persons from the benefits of the bill. It would be doing full justice to all to require that there should be a bona fide settlement; but if cultivation was required, a large class of settlers would be excluded, who were equally entitled to the benefits intended by the bill.

After some further remarks by Mr. CRITTENDEN, the question was taken on Mr. CRITTENDEN's amendment, and it was agreed to—yeas 26, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, King, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, and Webster.—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Norvell, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—21.

Mr. BAYARD then submitted an amendment, requiring that this act shall be construed in conformity with the rules which have been prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the former pre-emption law.

Mr. KING said that this amendment would produce some difficulty, as the set of rules first prescribed by by the General Land Office having been found, on practice, defective, had been set aside, and new ones established, which worked well, and were in present use.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested a modification of the amendment, so as to require the act to be construed in conformity with such rules as have been prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and are now in force; which modification was accepted by Mr. BAYARD.

Mr. BENTON expressed himself as entirely opposed to such a proceeding. The rules were infinitely more voluminous than the bill, and might tend to embarrass its provisions; and besides, he was averse to legislating official rules into a law.

Mr. KING also opposed the amendment, after which

Mr. BAYARD moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Monday, in order to give members time to look into the rules of the General Land Office, with regard to the construction of the pre-emption laws.

The question being taken on the motion to postpone, it was lost—yeas 23, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, and Webster—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, White, Wright, and Young—25.

Mr. BAYARD then modified his amendment so as to read as follows:

Insert after land, in the fourteenth line, "and that prior to any entries being made under the privileges given by this act, proof of settlement or improvement shall be made to the satisfaction of the Register and Receiver of the Land District in which such lands may be, agreeably to the rules which have been prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for that purpose, and are now in force."

Mr. MORRIS then moved an adjournment; which was carried by a vote of 30 to 17.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, January 27, 1838.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, renewed his application to submit a resolution instructing the Committee on Private Land Claims to inquire whether any, and if any what, further provisions ought to be made by law for the final settlement and legal decision of claims for land, but it was unsuccessful.

DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS.

The House then took up the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the following resolution, submitted on yesterday by Mr. RARIDEN:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to furnish such members of the present House of Representatives as have not received the same under former orders with the following books, to be paid for out of the contingent fund of this House, being such as have been supplied to members of the last and preceding Congress, viz:

The Diplomatic Correspondence, The Documentary History of the Revolution, The Land Laws, American State Papers, Register of Debates, Contested Elections, and Commercial Regulations, Elliott's Debates, and Elliott's Diplomatic Code—

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the reprinting of either of the above works.

Mr. BRIGGS had moved to strike from the above "The Diplomatic Code."

Mr. RARIDEN accepted this as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. BRIGGS then moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "orders" the following: "and who shall in writing notify the Clerk of their wish to receive them."

Mr. RARIDEN accepted of this also, as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, then moved to strike out all after the word "resolved," in the original resolution, and insert the following:

Resolved, That the late members of the House of Representatives of the 23d and 24th Congress, who have received, or are entitled to receive books, under the resolutions of the 23d and 24th Congress, are hereby directed and required to place them in the Library of Congress for the use of their successors, who shall have the right to use them whilst members, and during the sessions of Congress, and who shall replace them in the Library for the use of their successors; and said books shall be thus kept for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, and to be used and replaced in the Library of Congress from time to time as aforesaid. [The books were named in the amendment.]

Mr. BRONSON would inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky if he was aware of any authority to enforce obedience to the mandates of the resolution, in case it was adopted by the House?

Mr. WILLIAMS presumed if the House had authority to appoint committees with power to send for persons and papers, that it would have power to enforce obedience to a resolution of this kind.

Mr. BRONSON replied, that if the gentleman knew of any authority by which the resolution could be enforced, he would give it his support.

Mr. WILLIAMS had no doubt but that there was an authority in the House to enforce the resolution; but he supposed that, if this resolution was solemnly adopted by the House, there was no member of the Twenty-third or Twenty-fourth Congress who had received the books that would retain them.

Mr. BRIGGS could inform the gentleman from Kentucky of one member of that Congress who would retain them.

Mr. WILLIAMS had only to say, then, that he did not think any member ought to retain them, after a resolution of this kind should be adopted. He had no idea of an appropriation of this kind being made indirectly, through the means of the contingent fund of the House. If members of Congress did not receive a sufficient compensation for their services, let them say so. If eight dollars a day was insufficient, let their per diem be increased by a direct appropriation; but do not be charging the Government with six or eight hundred dollars for each member, in the shape of books. It was, in fact, but an increase of the salary of the members, so far as the United States was concerned, although they, the members, derived but little benefit from it. He had understood that these books had frequently been sold here by members of Congress at one-fourth the price which the Government had paid for them. He was credibly informed that the American State Papers, which cost the Government from twelve to fifteen dollars per volume, had been sold here for two dollars a volume. He thought it entirely improper that the money of the Government should be expended in this way, and he hoped, if it was necessary, that the information which these works contained should be furnished the new members of Congress, that the resolution he proposed should be adopted, so that the works might be retained here in the library of Congress, so that one set for each member might always be at hand. He had received the books which had been furnished heretofore, but he had received them upon the principle that General Jackson accepted of a second nomination to the office of President. He should now, however, yield up those works for the benefit of his successors, in case the resolution he had moved was adopted. He trusted, therefore, that the House would see the propriety of adopting his amendment.

Mr. RARIDEN was sorry that the gentleman from Kentucky had seen proper to move to strike out his resolution for the purpose of moving the amendment which had been moved. It seemed to him that his resolution, as he had modified it at the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, would prove satisfactory to a majority of the House. He (Mr. R.) conscientiously desired to have these works, but he did not desire to force them upon those who had any conscientious scruples about receiving them; therefore he had accepted of the modification of the gentleman from Massachusetts, so as to make it necessary for every gentleman who wished to have the books, to notify the Clerk of the same. Mr. R. then slightly modified his resolution further, and urged upon the House the propriety of adopting it.

Mr. MERCER then went into a detail of the description of books which Congress had heretofore seen proper to order to be printed for the information of members of Congress and the public.

Mr. MORGAN moved the previous question, which was seconded by the House.

Mr. BOND called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, but the House refused to order them, and the main question was ordered to be put without a division.

Mr. BOND then called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which was on the adoption of the original resolution, as modified by the mover, which were ordered, and were—yeas 113, nays 71.

So the resolution was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

25TH CONG.....2ND SESS. MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1838. VOLUME 6.....No. 10.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

The CHAIR announced the special order of the day.

Mr. HOWARD, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, gave notice, that so soon as this election question should be disposed of, or so soon as an opportunity offered, he should ask leave to take up the bill of the Senate, now on the Speaker's table, to preserve the neutrality of the United States on our frontiers.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The HOUSE then announced the special order of the day, being the consideration of the Mississippi election.

The question pending, being as follows:

Mr. BRONSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to their seats in the House as such.

The question pending, being on the motion of Mr. BELL, who on yesterday moved to amend by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting as follows:

"That the resolution of this House of the 3d October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material to a correct decision of the question presented, and the same is hereby rescinded.

Resolved further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Mississippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such.

Mr. MAURY, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House for a few minutes, in favor of the claim of the applicants to a seat on the floor, and stated to the House that it had been his intention to go into the subject generally, but as there seemed to be a disposition to take the question as soon as possible, and as he believed the House to be fully prepared to take the question, he would not interpose any obstacle; therefore he should decline making any further remarks on the subject.

Mr. BRONSON, after making some introductory remarks, said that he was not sure that he could shake any of the positions taken by the gentleman who had addressed the House, (Mr. Prentiss,) but he would try. Before he proceeded, however, he could not refrain from paying a tribute to the eloquence and zeal with which the gentleman had defended what he called the rights of the State of Mississippi. Mr. B. went on to show that the question had been presented to the House in a false light by the contestants, for he contended that no indignity whatever had been offered to the State of Mississippi; her rights of representation had been respected and defended, and the simple question was, a question between individuals as to who should have the right of so representing her.

Mr. B. contended that the decision of the House at the late special session was a judicial decision, and could not be altered; and, whether it was so, or not, that, previous to the special session, there existed a legal and constitutional vacancy, which the Governor was authorized to fill, and which he did fill.

Mr. B. entered into a long argument to prove that the Governor of Mississippi was authorized by the Constitution to fill a vacancy. He then portrayed, in glowing colors, the disastrous consequences which would ensue if the various Legislatures had not that power. He said the country might be ravaged by an invading enemy, or might be at war with ten nations at once, without having the power of calling together and assembling the House of Representatives to act on the subject. He was fully aware of the strength of the arguments adduced by one of the contestants, (Mr. Prentiss,) viz: that the Governors of States might thus anticipate, defeat or destroy the regular election. But it would be obvious to every reflecting mind that there was not the slightest probability of such a course ever being adopted; and, if it were, there were ample means of speedy redress.

Perhaps the most important question, after assuming that the Governor had the power, was, "did he exercise that power?" It had been contended that such was not the case, and that the proclamation of the Governor was a mere nullity. For his part, he maintained that the Governor had a right to fill the whole vacancy, or none. He was not authorized to fill a part of a vacancy, but the whole; therefore, if the gentlemen elected in July were elected at all, they were elected for the whole term of the Twenty-fifth Congress.

Mr. B. commented at some length on the absurdity of the argument, that because the Governor had inserted a superfluity in his writ and proclamation, the whole was thereby rendered void. He maintained that the decision of the House at the late session, was a judicial decision, made after a full and complete investigation of all the facts, and that therefore it was binding and could not be reversed. He denied that the decision was ex parte as had been alleged, and was proceeding in proof thereof, when he gave way to a motion of adjournment. And the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, Jan. 27, 1838.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the petition of sundry citizens of Davidson county, Tennessee, praying for the establishment of a post route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. LYON presented a petition numerously signed by the inhabitants of the country lying in the vicinity of the road commenced by the United States, and running from Toledo, on the Maumee river, to Michigan City, in the State of Indiana, setting forth the importance of that road in a national point of view, and praying Congress to make an appropriation to complete it with as little delay as practicable: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of Caleb Atwater, praying compensation for services rendered as commissioner to treat with certain Indian tribes: referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the daughter of John Sherburne, late of the army of the Revolution.

Mr. M. from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Garrett Tennison, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. NILES presented the petition of sundry citizens of Connecticut, praying for the establishment of a light-house: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The report of the Committee on Commerce, unfavorable to the petition of Joseph W. Page of Charleston, was considered and concurred in.

The Senate then took up the bill granting preemption rights to settlers on the public lands, and, after the adoption of several amendments, the bill was ordered to be engrossed by a vote of 26 to 12.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, Jan. 29, 1838.

A message in writing from the President of the United States, received on Saturday last, was laid before the House; and having been read, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, was laid on the table.

The message communicated a report of the commission in relation to spoliations by the Creeks and Seminoles.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The following message and accompanying report were received at the same time, and now laid before the House:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith communicate to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, in answer to their resolution of the 9th instant.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, Jan. 26, 1838.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 25, 1838.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, dated the 9th inst. requesting the President to communicate to that body what measures, if any, have been taken by the Executive, for the release of Mr. Greely, a citizen of Maine, now imprisoned in the provincial jail of New Brunswick, at Fredericton, for an alleged violation of the jurisdiction of said province, over the territory claimed by the British Government; and also, to communicate any correspondence which the Executive Department may have had with the British Government, or the Executive of Maine, upon the subject of said Greely's imprisonment, so far as a communication of the same may be deemed by him not incompatible with the public interest.

And likewise requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to that House "any correspondence or communication held between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain, at different times, respecting the wardenship, occupation, or actual possession, of that part of the territory of the State of Maine which is claimed by Great Britain," has the honor to report to the President the accompanying documents, which embrace the information and correspondence not heretofore published by Congress, called for by the above cited resolution.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN FORSYTH.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the further consideration of the subject was postponed till Thursday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication of the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of the contingent expenses of the Navy Department; which, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, was laid on the table.

CHEROKEE MEMORIAL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the memorial of John Ross and other Indians of that tribe, remonstrating against the treaty at New Echota.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. HOPKINS to reconsider the vote of the House of Monday last, refusing to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. EVERETT inquired if the motion to reconsider was debateable?

The CHAIR replied that generally a motion to reconsider opened the whole merits of the question; that is, if the original motion under it was a debateable one; but the motion to lay on the table not being debateable, consequently, that to reconsider it could not be.

After some further conversation between the CHAIR and Mr. EVERETT, the latter gentleman asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider, which were ordered, and were—yeas 121, nays 82, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Bruyn, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoon, Cambreleng, Timothy J. Messrs. EVANS, FAIRFIELD, CARTER, ANDERSON, SMITH, CILLEY, DAVEE, and NOYES, of Maine.

[Mr. SMITH presented the petition of the citizens of Portland, Maine, in favor of a general bankrupt law. Also, of Samuel Goldsbury. Also, of Henry R. Stickney.]

At the hour of 1 o'clock the CHAIR announced the special order, being the case of the Mississippi Election.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of continuing the presentation of petitions; and the motion being taken by tellers, was decided in the negative, ayes 105, nays 71, not two-thirds.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The question pending being as follows:

Mr. BRONSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to their seats in the House as such.

The question pending being on the motion of Mr. BELL, who had moved to amend by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows: "That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material to a correct decision of the question presented, and the same is hereby rescinded."

Resolved further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Misssippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such.

Mr. BRONSON, who was entitled to the floor, proceeded with his remarks, and replied to the arguments of one of the applicants for a seat on the floor (Mr. Prentiss) in relation to the decision of the last session of Congress as being ex parte, and contended that that decision was decisive on the question, and must be binding. Mr. B. went into an examination of the meaning of the words ex parte, and contended that the decision of the House at the extra session was not ex parte, there being discussion, and evidence produced on both sides of the question; and, in his opinion, it would be unjust to reverse that decision, because the sitting members had asserted on the floor of the House, that if it decided in their favor, that they would not be candidates in the canvass then going on in Mississippi. The whole facts of the case were laid before the House at the extra session, and the matter was therefore fully discussed, so that there could be no mistake in relation to the decision made at that time. He then went generally into an examination of the various documents on the subject, and the acts of the Governor of Mississippi in relation to it, and contended that in whatever light you might view it, the decision of the House at the extra session must be binding, and that it was impossible that gentlemen could be constitutionally elected members of this House at the November election, when there was no vacancy in the representation of Mississippi, this House having decided that the sitting members were entitled to seats during the whole Congress.

The House having decided they were thus entitled to their seats, they were not candidates in November, and in many counties where they received large majorities in July, they received not a vote in November; their friends refraining from voting at all for members of Congress, believing the decision of the House to be final, and that there was no vacancy in the representation of the State. This was borne out by the fact, that at the November election there were upwards of eight thousand more votes given for Governor than for members of Congress. Would it, therefore, he would now ask, be right to reverse this decision, even if it was incorrect. If it was incorrect, which he would only admit for the sake of the argument, it would be doing the greatest injustice to reverse it. The election of November was held under the decision of this House, and many of the friends of the sitting members, on the faith of that decision, remained at home on the election day, or at least refused to cast their votes for members of Congress. It was not to be believed that an election held in this way could express the will and wishes of the people of Mississippi.

Mr. B. replied at some length to the arguments of the contestant to a seat on this floor, and concluded by hoping that the House would not reverse the decision of the extra session.

Mr. JENIFER replied, at some length, to the arguments of the gentleman who had preceded him in support of the decision of the House at the extra session, and contended that new evidence was now presented to the House, and that if the decision of the extra session was wrong, that now was the proper time to correct the error. He went generally into a detail of the evidence presented at the called session, and that now presented, for the purpose of showing that the question was now presented to the House in an entirely different light from what it was when the decision was made. The whole evidence in the State of Mississippi, the Governor's proclamation, the writs of election, the certificates of the Governor and Secretary of State, all went to show that the sitting members were elected only for the extra session. This was the opinion, too, he contended, of the people of Mississippi, as was evidenced by the fact of their holding an election for members of Congress in November last. He replied to the arguments of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BRONSON,) in relation to the vote for the Governor of the State being larger than for members of Congress; and asserted that the contestants had a larger vote than had ever before been given in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. ROBERTSON followed on the same side, and spoke at some length in support of the right of the contestants to seats as representatives of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. LEGARE obtained the floor, but stated that as the hour was late, he thrown himself upon the indulgence of the House, by asking a more favorable hour for addressing the body. He thereupon moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana called for the yeas and nays on this motion, but the House refused to order them, and

The House then adjourned.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. ADAMS on the 18th ult.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a copy and translation of the pamphlet in the Spanish language, stated in the report of the Secretary of State to this House to have been printed and circulated by the late minister from the Republic of Mexico, Gorostiza, before his departure from this country, and the name of the diplomatic functionary from a foreign Government who communicated a copy of said pamphlet to the Secretary of State.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HOWARD to strike ont all that part relating to the name of the diplomatic functionary, after the word "country" in the eighth line.

Mr. HOWARD, remarking that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) entitled to the floor being absent from indisposition, moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject till to-morrow.

Mr. ADAMS deemed it of great importance that the pamphlet in question should be in the possession of the House, from the attitude of our relations with Mexico; and, consequently, that the resolution should be soon adopted, because it would take some time to translate the pamphlet. He, therefore, expressed a hope that the gentleman from Maryland would withdraw his objection, or that the House would take the question at once.

In reference to the merits of the call, Mr. A. insisted that the information was indispensable to the House. Here was the country brought to the very verge of a war by the course of the Executive, and yet they were denied the information upon which the President had brought the country to this point. Mr. A. said "denied," for, in the call of the House for the correspondence between this Government and that of Mexico, all communication between the ministers of the two countries had been expressly and positively withheld or suppressed, under the restrictive clause in the call so strenuously insisted upon by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. HAYNES) viz: that saying if, in his (the President's) opinion, not incompatible with the public interest. Now, if there were negotiations pending at this time between Mexico and the United States, that would be a sufficient reason for the President to deny communicating these papers; but when they were told that no negotiations were pending, for they were informed that the President had exhausted all argument for negotiating, and nothing more was to be done but for Congress to assume their power, it did seem the most extraordinary thing in the world that all the information in possession of the Executive, could not be at once communicated. What! were they to go to war without this information? Was this conntry to be drawn into a declaration of war, without being put in possession of the information necessary to show the grounds of such a step? Surely they ought to have a copy of that pamphlet, a pamphlet described, in a demi-semi official response to it as an outrage without precedent. Mr. A. did not justify the act of Gorostiza, which might be called an act of indiscretion, but it did not merit all that had been said of it. Nor was it without precedent, and he particularly referred to the case of Gwinnett.

Mr. A's remarks were cut off by the annunciation of the special order, being the case of the

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The question pending being as follows:

Mr. BRONSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to their seats in the House as such.

The question pending being on the motion of Mr. BELL, who had moved to amend by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows: "That the resolution of this House of the 3d October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material to a correct decision of the question presented, and the same is hereby rescinded."

Resolved further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Mississippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such.

Mr. LEGARE, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at considerable length in support of the right of the sitting members, Messrs. CLAIBORNE and GHOLSON, to retain their seats. Mr. L. went into a lengthy argument to prove that the sitting members were duly elected by the people of Mississidpi, and that they were entitled to seats for the whole Congress. He based his argument on the Constitution of the United States, it being over and above the acts of the Governor and people of Mississippi; and the argument of gentlemen that it was only intended to elect the sitting members for the extra session by the people, he considered entirely erroneous.

Mr. EVANS addressed the House at some length in support of the rights of the contestants to seats, and in reply to the arguments of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LEGARE,) and others, who had spoken in favor of the sitting members.

Mr. CUSHMAN then stated that as this question had consumed a great deal of the time of the House; and as he presumed every gentleman had now made up his opinion in relation to the question, he now demanded the previous question.

Mr. WISE called the attention of the gentleman from New Hampshire to the facts that one of the members now asking seats on this floor had not had the opportunity of saying a word, and that it was the wish of the other gentlemen again to address some remarks to the House, in reply to the arguments which gentlemen had made in opposition to their right to seats in this Congress.

Mr. CUSHMAN replied that if this was the case, he would withdraw the motion, to enable the contestants to address the House, if they desired it.

Mr. PRENTISS then rose, and intimated a wish to address some remarks to the House, but gave way to

Mr. MASON of Virginia, who addressed the House for a few minutes in explanation of the vote he had given at the extra session. He stated that at the extra session he had voted in favor of the sitting members taking their seats in this House; but from subsequent examination and reflection, he had come to the determination that the better plan would be to send both the delegations back to the people.

Mr. PRENTISS then obtained the floor, and addressed the House a few minutes; when he gave way to

Mr. WISE, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 30, 1838.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Treasury Department, in compliance with the resolution submitted by Mr. WEBSTER, inquiring whether any of the pensions and fishing bounties paid at Boston, were paid in notes of the Commonwealth Bank of Massachusetts, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER said he would not detain the Senate, by requiring the reading of the document, but would merely move for the printing of it. He would, however, take occasion to say, as the Secretary and collector put the payment of these pensions and bounties in Commonwealth Bank notes, on the ground that they were voluntarily received. Now it happened that he had this morning received by mail an affidavit, relating to the payment of a pension, which he would read to the Senate.

Mr. W. here read an affidavit of an individual, named Asa Pickering on the subject, and moved that it be printed together with the report and documents from the Treasury Department.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama supposed the Senator did not mean to print the affidavit as a part of the documents belonging to the Treasury report.

Mr. WEBSTER replied certainly not. He wished it to be printed separately.

The report and documents were then ordered to be printed, as was also the affidavit just read.

The CHAIR also communicated a report from the War Department, showing the number of persons employed in the Indian Department for the year 1837; which was laid on the table.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the petition of a number of Cherokee pensioners, praying provision for injuries sustained in the late war: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. S. also presented a memorial from A. and G. Ralston of Philadelphia, praying to be refunded certain duties paid by them for the Newcastle and Frenchtown Railroad Company to the collector of the Wilmington district, under (an alleged) misconstruction of the act of July 1, 1836: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce, in Charleston, sanctioning a memorial from certain citizens of North Carolina, in relation to the railroad from Halifax to Wilmington, which they ask to have made a mail route, and show the comparative advantages that will result therefrom. The memorialists state that the mail, as at present carried, takes ninety-eight hours from Halifax to Augusta, which they can accomplish by their road in fifty-eight hours. And again, the mail from Halifax to Charleston, S. C. as now carried, takes ninety-four and a half hours, while their line, after the first of May, will carry it the same distance in forty-six hours, making a clear saving of forty-eight hours. In a very little while they will do away the necessity of the Express mail, as no other mode can compete with them in point of velocity.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented two petitions from citizens of Maine, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Also, a petition remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union. The question of receiving the first of these was laid on the table, and the last petition itself was laid on the table.

Also, the petition of Richard Cogan, praying permission to enter certain lands at Government price.

Also, from the citizens of Scott county, Missouri, praying pre-emption rights or privilege of entering improvements.

Also, a petition of the citizens of Platte county, Missouri, praying for a mail route from Platsburg to Black Snake Hill, near the mouth of Rodway river and Missouri river.

Also, a petition from G. M. Davis, Joseph Baker, sr. and others for establishing a mail route from Frankfort Illinois, Brownsville, Gill's Ferry to Jackson, Missouri, so as to run from Frankfort via Brownsville, Breesville, Illinois, Manning's store, More and Manning's store, to Frederickton.

Also, from citizens of Clay county, for a post route from Liberty, Clay county, to Black Snake Hills.

The above petitions were all appropriately referred.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the petition and papers of John H. McIntosh were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented several memorials praying an appropriation for the completion of the frigate Raritan: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McKEAN, pursuant to notice, and on leave granted, introduced a bill further regulating writs of error and suits for penalties in the courts of the United States; which was read a first and second tind, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been recommitted the memorial of the heirs of Captain John Fulford, deceased, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Claims, reported, without amendment, several bills from the House that had been referred to that committee.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the memorial of General Matthew Arbuckle, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the Message of the President in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 14th of October last, on the subject, reported a bill to amend the act entitled an act for the appointment of Commissioners to adjust and settle claims to reservations of land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaw Indians: read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TALLMADGE, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Henry Eckford, deceased; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Reuben E. Gentry, William Munroe, and others; which was twice read and referred.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose to make an explanation, by the unanimous consent of the Senate. He said that a few days ago, when the Military bill was before the Senate, he had stated, upon what he then deemed satisfactory information, that officers of the corps of Military Engineers had often been employed as engineers in the service of railroad and canal companies. Since that time, he had learned that this remark ought to have been confined to the officers of the Topographical Corps of Engineers. Upon a complaint having been made to him, he had immediately instituted an inquiry on the subject; and the result was, that no officer belonging to the Military Engineers proper had thus been employed. He made this explanation most cheerfully, as it always afforded him pleasure to repair any injustice which he might have inadvertently committed.

The bill for the relief of Francis Newman was read the third time and passed.

The bill providing for the legal adjustment and final settlement of claims to land derived under the grants to the Baron Bastrop, the Marquis of Maison Rouge, and others, in Louisiana, and Gabriel Winter, and others, in Arkansas, was read the third time; and on the question, "Shall the bill pass," a debate arose, in which it was supported by Messrs. LINN, BUCHANAN, SEVIER, and PRESTON, and opposed by Messrs. MORRIS and CRITTENDEN; after which,

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 10.

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White, and Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Clayton, Crittenden, Morris, Pierce, Roane, Smith of Indiana, Spence, and Tipton—10.

The bill to amend the act for the relief of James Steele, was read the third time and passed.

PRE-EMPTION TO SETTLERS ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, as the unfinished business, it being on its passage, having been read the third time; and after a debate, in which the bill was supported by Messrs. WALKER, WHITE, YOUNG, WEBSTER, and LYON, and opposed by Messrs. CLAY and DAVIS, the question was taken, and the bill was passed—yeas 30, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, and Wall—18.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 31, 1838.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting the annual report of the contracts made for the transportation of the mails of the United States, within the year ending the 1st of July, 1837; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting a report of all the fines imposed, and deductions made from the pay of the contractors, for carrying the mails during the year ending on the 30th of June, 1837; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH asked the consent of the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union on the bill in relation to testing the strength of steam boilers.

Mr. EVERETT objecting—

Mr. SMITH moved a suspension of the rule, to enable him to submit the motion; but the House refused—ayes 72, noes 69, not two-thirds.

Mr. LOOMIS, on leave, laid on the table an amendment he proposed to submit to the bill in relation to the laws of neutrality; and the same was ordered to be printed.

Reports from standing committees were then called for.

CLAIMS.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio reported a bill for the relief of Cornelius Tiers.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. CRAIG reported a bill for the relief of Theodore Middleton.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS of Tennessee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Bennet Shurley, deceased.

When the Committee on Public Expenditures was called—

Mr. WISE rose and begged leave to inquire of the chairman of that committee if the committee had held a meeting this session, and if it was probable they would make any report.

Mr. HALEY (the chairman of that committee) would cheerfully respond to the inquiry. The committee had held a meeting, but had as yet come to no conclusion in relation to the subject for which they were nominally organized. The fact was that their duties appeared to be superseded by other committees, viz: the Committee on Public Buildings took charge of the expenditures under that head; the Committee of Ways and Means of the general expenses, and other committees of different branches of the service, as pointed out by the rules of the House. Mr. H. added that they were ready and willing to go into any examination which the House thought proper, and would report the result of their investigations to the House.

Mr. WISE did not hear the gentleman's reply correctly, but if he had rightly understood him, it was, in substance, that the committee had not gone into any examination as yet, because they were not informed of their duties. Mr. W. would inform the gentleman, that if he would look into the rules of the House, he would find what the duties of that committee were. No one could be mistaken in them.

MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. MASON of Ohio reported a bill for the relief of Joseph E. Nourse.

Mr. GRENNELL reported a bill for the relief of Mary A. Patrick.

ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland reported a bill making an appropriation to complete that part of the great National road between Rockville, in Maryland, and the Monocacy river.

When the "Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of State," was called,

Mr. WISE inquired if that committee had held a meeting, and if it was probable that they would take up the subject committed to them, and make any report?

No response was given.

When the "Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of the Treasury" was called,

Mr. WISE propounded the same inquiry.

Mr. ALLEN of Vermont (the chairman) stated that the committee had not, as yet, held any meeting; but they would do so, and expected to make a report in due season, as they should find it necessary.

When the "Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of War" was called—

Mr. WISE renewed the same inquiry.

Mr. CLOWNEY (the chairman thereof) replied that the committee had held one meeting this session, but had done nothing as yet.

Mr. WISE propounded the same interrogatory when the "Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of the Navy" was called, but no response was given.

The "Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of the Post Office" being called—

Mr. WISE would make a special inquiry of the chairman of that committee, if they had looked at all into the expenses of the Past Office Department, or if it was probable that they would?

No response was given.

The same interrogatory was propounded by Mr. WISE when the "Committee on the Expenditures on the Public Buildings" was called, but the result was the same as on the preceding.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, from the select committee appointed on the memorial of the Sergeant-at-Arms, in relation to a deficiency of money received from the Bank of the Metropolis at the late special session, made the following report:

The committee to whom the memorial of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of the 11th of January was referred, respectfully report that, in pursuance of the orders of the House, they proceeded to examine the books and papers of the Bank of the Metropolis and of the Sergeant-at-Arms. This examination resulted in the discovery, as the committee unanimously believe, that at the close of the late extra session of Congress an unintentional error was committed at the bank in paying in gross and in specie, the checks of the Speaker for the pay of the members.

The opinion of the committee that there is in the bank three thousand eight hundred and eighty-six dollars and seventy-one cents, to which the Sergeant-at-Arms is entitled, has been communicated to the board of directors, and they have paid the sum promptly to Mr. Dorsey.

The committee are much indebted to the board of directors for the use of a room in their banking house to conduct their examination, and ask the House to discharge them from the further consideration of the subject.

The report, having been read, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. ADAMS on the 18th ult.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a copy and translation of the pamphlet, in the Spanish language, stated in the report of the Secretary of State to this House to have been printed and circulated by the late minister from the Republic of Mexico, Gorostiza, before his departure from this country, and the name of the diplomatic functionary from a foreign Government who communicated a copy of said pamphlet to the Secretary of State.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HOWARD to strike out all that part relating to the name of the diplomatic functionary, after the word "country" in the eighth line.

Mr. ADAMS, who was entitled to the floor, proceeded with his remarks upon the resolution until the expiration of the morning hour; when

The CHAIR here announced the order of the day.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The question pending being as follows:

Mr. BRONSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to their seats in the House as such.

The question pending being on the motion of Mr. BELL, who had moved to amend by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows: "That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material to a correct decision of the question presented, and the same is hereby rescinded."

Resolved further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Mississippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such.

Mr. BELL now modified his amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert "That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress be rescinded, and that Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE are not duly elected members of the 25th Congress.

Resolved, That S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress on the first Monday and day following in November last, and that they are entitled to take their seats in this House as such.

Mr. B. explained his object to be to make the latter a distinct proposition.

Mr. PRENTISS resumed, and concluded his remarks in reply to the gentlemen who had addressed the House in support of the sitting members.

Mr. CUSHMAN then demanded the previous question.

Mr. PARKER moved a call of the House.

Mr. BOON called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 190, nays 19.

So a call of the House was ordered, and was proceeded in for some time, the names of the absentees called over, and all excused but four, when

Mr. BRONSON moved that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered, and were—yeas 122, nays 98.

So the further proceedings on the call were dispensed with, and the question recurring upon seconding the motion for the previous question, tellers being ordered, it was decided in the negative—ayes 107, noes 111.

So there was no second.

Mr. HAYNES then briefly addressed the House in support of the sitting members.

Mr. WISE called for a division of the question on the amendment, so as to take the question separately on the latter part of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIR stated that the motion to strike out and insert was not divisible by the rule.

Mr. BELL then withdrew the latter part of his amendment.

Mr. CUSHMAN then called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. BELL; which were ordered, and were—yeas 119, nays 112, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, William B. Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clowney, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Halstead, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, William Herod, Ogden Hoffman, George W. Hopkins, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, W. C. Johnson, Lawler, Lewis, Lincoln, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Samson Mason, Maury, Maxwell, McKay, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Mathias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Patton, Pearce, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Richardson, Ridgway, Robertson, Rumsey, Russell, Sawyer, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Albert S. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—112.

So the amendment was agreed to; and the question recurring upon the resolution as amended—

Mr. HOWARD rose and remarked that they had arrived at a stage in these proceedings at which he wished to pause, and wished the House to pause, in order to see in what direction they should next shape their course. He would not question the validity of the decision just made; but so much doubt hung upon the whole subject, that he had taken into his serious consideration the suggestion thrown out yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MASON) to send the election back to the people.

After some further remarks, Mr. H. submitted a proposition to that effect, as an amendment to the amendment just adopted.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina rose, and stated that he was requested to announce that Messrs. Prentiss and Word, members elect from the State of Mississippi, were now in attendance before the House, and were ready to be qualified.

The CHAIR informed the gentleman that the House had adopted no resolution. It had adopted an amendment, but had adopted no resolution in relation to this matter.

Mr. McKAY stated that he had voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, because he believed the election, held in the State of Mississippi, in July last, was not in conformity with the Constitution of the United States. He further stated that it was not his intention, by that vote, to give the seats vacated to the members here claiming seats. He was of the same opinion expressed on yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia; and he was in favor of sending back to the people of Mississippi the whole matter. Mr. McK. went on and briefly explained his view of the constitutional question.

After some further remarks by Messrs. BELL, CAMBRELENG, and THOMPSON,

Mr. OWENS moved that the House adjourn: lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved the previous question, but the House refused to second it—ayes 95, noes 119.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland; which were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD, at the suggestion of Mr. McKAY, modified his amendment by declaring that Messrs. Prentiss and Word were not duly elected.

Mr. McKAY suggested that the gentleman modify his amendment so as to declare that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are not duly elected members of the 25th Congress.

Mr. HOWARD modified his amendment as follows: "And that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are not entitled to seats in this House as members of the 25th Congress; and that their seats be declared vacated, and that the Speaker of this House inform the Governor of Mississippi of that fact."

Mr. THOMPSON then moved to amend the amendment, by striking out all after the names of Messrs. "Prentiss and Word," and substitute the words "are duly elected, but are not entitled to seats."

After a few remarks by Mr. TILLINGHAST—

Mr. THOMPSON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BELL moved an adjournment. Lost without a division.

Mr. PATTON made a few remarks in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

Messrs. HAYNES and GLASCOCK supported the amendment in a few remarks, and it was opposed by Messrs. POPE and UNDERWOOD.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

Also, one of similar purport, from citizens of Berks county, Pennsylvania: laid on the table.

Mr. NILES said he rose to do what he had never before been called on to perform while in that body, to wit: to present petitions in relation to the abolition of slavery. He would present them, in compliance with his duty. They were signed by 150 persons, men and women. One asked for the abolishment of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, the other for its abolishment in the Territories, and one against the slave trade in the States; also, one remonstrating against the annexation of Texas. That relating to Texas was laid on the table, and on those relating to slavery, the motion to receive was laid on the table.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of E. W. and H. Smith. accompanied with a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TIPTON, from the same committee, moved to be discharged from the further consideration of the report communicated from the War Department, in relation to the improvement of the navigation of Black, White, and St. Francis rivers, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On the question as to the most appropriate reference, some incidental remarks were made by Messrs. LINN, SEVIER, and TIPTON, showing the magnitude of these rivers, and their vast importance to the inland navigation of the Western States.

The motion was laid on the table at the suggestion of Mr. KING, who pledged himself to do all in his power to favor the views of those gentlemen, consistent with his duty to the Constitution and the people.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the several memorials, praying for an appropriation for the completion of the frigate Raritan, made a report thereon.

On motion of Mr. ROANE, the Committee on the District of Columbia was authorized to employ a clerk.

The reports of the Committee on the Judiciary, unfavorable to the petitions of John McCleary and William Patton, were severally considered and concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of William Hunter.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted.

Resolved, That so much of the different reports of the commissioners appointed under the acts of July, 1832, and 1833, for the final adjustment of private land claims, in the State of Missouri, as have not been acted on by Congress be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, leave was granted to John McCleary to withdraw his petition and papers.

The bill to change the times of holding the Circuit Court of the United States for the seventh circuit, was read the third time and passed.

The bill to amend the act entitled "an act to provide for the appointment of commissioners to adjust and settle claims to reservations of land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaw Indians," was also read the third time and passed.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The CHAIR announced as the special order "the bill to impose additional duties as depositaries, upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of Public Money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys of the United States."

Mr. CLAYTON observed that there were some other bills on the special order, which had the precedence over this bill.

Mr. TIPTON observed that the Cumberland Road bill was before the one just announced, though he should not press its claims at present, being willing to let the discussion commence and progress on the latter; but he gave notice, that if the debate should continue long, he would feel it his duty to move to lay by the bill, and take up that for the Cumberland Road.

Mr. HUBBARD then moved to postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. CLAY rose, and addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. President, the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire, as I understand it, is to postpone all the orders of the day which precede that measure which is usually called the Sub-Treasury bill, for the purpose of taking that bill up. Sir, for myself I am ready, and always ready, to meet that bill when it does come up, and to discharge my duty in respect to it as far as I can, with such power and humble ability as I possess. But I have risen on the present occasion to make a oposition, or rather to recommend to the friends of this bill themselves to make one.

It has been said, and said correctly, by the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, that this bill is of immense importance; and, sir, it is my deliberate opinion that there has been no bill, from the commencement of the Government, of such momentous magnitude, or fraught with such tremendous consequences, as this. Sir, I have no desire to create undue prejudice against this measure, but I declare my full and solemn conviction that all the calamities of war with the most potent power on earth would be a blessing compared with the consequences of this measure. Sir, I believe it will lead to the consolidation of the Government, or rather the powers of the Government, in its Federal authority, and that it will tend to destroy the power and influence of the States themselves. It will place at the feet of the Secretary of the Treasury a power equal to the combined power of the 800 or 900 banks dispersed throughout the Union; and, superadded to this, the whole power of the late Bank of the United States. All this, sir, would be the ultimate result of this measure, if adopted; it will place all this power at the feet of the Secretary of the Treasury, who himself lies at the feet of the President of the United States!

Entertaining these opinions of this measure, it is my wish, not on my own account, nor on that of the friends with whom I am in the habit of acting, but for the sake of the country, that this measure should not now be taken up. I wish that we should receive from our constituents, the States and the people, such instruction or expressions of their will and opinion as they may choose to transmit to this city. The Legislatures of several States are now deliberating on the subject, and some of them have adopted resolutions upon it which have not yet reached us. At Richmond we know something has been done. Sir, I want to hear from the West, from Albany, from Richmond, from all quarters of the country that are so deeply and vitally interested in this measure, before we take the vote upon it; and from Harrisburg especially, though last not least, that we may hear what the Keystone State has to say on this subject.

Sir, I say, with surprise, that I cannot comprehend the recent reversal of the course of legislation in Congress. In the good old days of former times, what was the course of legislation? Then, all great measures originated—where? In this branch? No, sir: they originated with people's representatives in the other end of the capitol. Measures relating to taxes, the public treasure, to our armies and navies, originated where they ought to originate, with those who are nearest the people. There these great and important measures were matured and sent to the Senate. But this safe, Republican, Democratic course of legislation has been totally reversed. Sir, why is this? Is it the result of any peculiar composition of the Senate, making it nearer the Executive, or a better mirror of its views, that these reversed proceedings have been adopted. At this session the army bill has originated here; yesterday the land bill (that great Agrarian project) was passed here; and now we have the Sub-Treasury project here introduced. Sir, is this the proper branch of Congress for the origin of such vast measures? Why are they originated here?

But again: is it not a consideration of peculiar fitness, that we should hear from the other House before we send them this bill again? Last year we sent it, nearly as it now is, except that the present bill is far more objectionable, mischievous, and monstrous than it was; and what became of it? Sir, it was unacceptable to the representatives of the people. They did not choose to adopt this new experiment on our prosperity, and they laid it on the table, where I hoped it would lie in perpetual and eternal repose. Why, then, is this measure again brought before us, before we hear from the other House? Let it be considered there, and let us hear from the representatives of the people their views on this subject.

Sir, I do not know what will be fate of this measure; but I put it to the consideration of the honorable chairman of the committee and his friends, whether it is not more in character for the Senate to wait for these instructions from legislative bodies and other proper and popular sources, in relation to this measure, rather than thus to hurry its passage. Sir, is it right thus to act—to commit ourselves, our judgment, and our opinions, to this measure, till these high and legislative authorities shall be heard from?

I shall make no motion: I have risen for no such purpose; but to recommend to the friends of the measure to wait a few days or weeks longer, till we hear from those bodies who have the subject under consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT, in reply, went briefly into the history of the progress of this bill, again alluded to the complaints of delay which he said had been made by the opponents of the bill, and expressed his readiness to submit to the will of the Senate as to further delay. He would not now discuss the propriety of originating such measures in the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked on the alleged object of former delay, that it was to have time for Senators to examine and consider the bill, and to prepare substitutes and amendments, and said that a good deal of feeling was excited when it was hinted that the real object was to gain time. He was not disposed to doubt the sincerity of these reasons for delay; but could any Senator now take that ground for farther postponement?

He agreed with the Senator from Kentucky that this bill was of the deepest import; it claimed the profoundest and earlies attention of this body; and the Senator could not have greater confidence in the correctness of his opinions than Mr. C. had in his.

The Senator says it will greatly augment Executive patronage.

Mr. CLAY. I did not say so; but I now say it will.

Mr. CALHOUN. I shall be glad to meet the Senator on that question; for if ever there was a question about which I had perfect confidence, it is that. So far from augmenting, it will diminish, not only Executive patronage, but that of the Government generally, more than any other measure. I will not discuss that question now; but, come when it will, I stand prepared to make good my ground.

It was formerly urged by the Senator from Kentucky that this measure would create disunion; but, as it is out of order now, I suppose, to speak of disunion, it is therefore now urged by the Senator that it will cause consolidation. Sir, I feel equal confidence in my ability to meet this question as to meet the other.

But the Senator says the State Legislatures are in session, and wishes to hear further the expression of public sentiment. This is a reason for progressing with the bill. Let us argue here and let our arguments go to the States, pro and con; we can discuss the subject better than the States, as we are necessarily possessed of full information; and, before we come to a decison, most of the State Legislatures will have adjourned. The political friends of the Senator in the Legislatures would, I doubt not, like to be enlightened by his views on the subject. But there are other reasons for proceeding at once. The state of commerce and the business of the country demand an early decision.

But the Senator complains that the order of business has been reversed; that great measures, formerly originated only in the House, are now originated in the Senate. The Senate is a smaller body; and, from the necessity of the case, it has taken the lead. The Senate formerly sat with closed doors on legislative as well as executive business; and if the Senator's argument is good, they should do so now. But the Senate is more numerous and popular now than it was then. I hope the bill will be taken up, and let the argument proceed, even if we do not come to a decision before we obtain all the information which the Senator desires. We can wait for the decision, and let the arguments go on.

Mr. CLAY said, the honorable Senator with a vast deal of self-complacency, avows his readiness at all times to meet and repel arguments from any quarter on the points to which he has alluded. Sir, it is not my habit to give challenges in advance; but the Senator may rest assured, that with whatever ability he may prove there is no augmentation of Executive patronage by this measure. I think far less ability may prove the contrary, when the question comes up; and that consolidation, also, of the powers of the Government is a necessary consequence of the measure under consideration. I shall not enter into the argument now; all my argument is designed to show the vast importance of this measure, and to invite the Senate to wait the expressions of opinions which we have cause to expect from all quarters of the Union.

But the Senator thinks we ought not to wait, but first argue the subject here, and send out our opinions to the jury of the country. But suppose a Senator commits himself for or against the measure, and instructions come directing him to take the opposite course; what is he to do then? Must he take back his argument and eat his words? No, sir: let us inquire, and get our instructions in the good old way, and let us obey them. Let us not commit ourselves one way or the other, till we hear from our constituents.

Mr. C. again urged that important measures ought to originate, as formerly, in the other House.

He would make no motion to delay this bill, and no objection to Mr. HUBBARD'S motion. If the friends of this measure, said Mr. C. will not wait for further information, let them come on; we are prepared for them, and ready to meet even their redoubtable champion from South Carolina, and to show that the tendency of this measure is to overturn the liberties of the people, and to give to one man the powers of the Government.

The Senator says it is not now in order to speak of disunion; and he does not see that this measure can lead both to consolidation and disseverance. Sir, I said at the last session, and I now repeat, that the want of a uniform currency is unfavorable to union, and its tendency is unfriendly to its existence; and I say, also, that consolidation is a result of this measure; that it is dangerous and destructive to the Union, because it will appear that it is ruinous to the best interests of the country, and destructive to liberty.

As to the Senator's readiness to repel arguments whenever the question shall arise, I trust I can show to the country, to every unprejudiced man, that the consequences which I have mentioned will ensue from this measure.

Sir, let the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire prevail, if the friends of this measure are not disposed to wait and hear from the high authorities that are now considering it; and let them precipitate themselves down the road to ruin in which they are proceeding, the ruin not only of the Administration, but of the country; we are ready to act for their salvation in the best manner we can.

Mr. HUBBARD said that, if he understood the Senator from Kentucky, he would make no further objection to the adoption of the motion which he had made to postpone the previous orders for the purpose of taking up, for consideration, the Sub-Treasury bill, (as it had been called.) At the same time, the Senator said he would appeal to the friends of this bill to give their assent to a further postponement of this measure; and he had submitted the reasons which ought, in his judgment, to induce the friends of this measure to comply with his request. He had attentively heard those reasons; he believed that he well understood them; and, according to his poor understanding, the reasons which he has urged for delay, are reasons which should induce an early and an immediate action upon this subject.

The Senator, in stating the importance of this measure, remarked "that all the calamities of war with the most potent power on earth, would be a blessing compared with the effects of this measure upon the country." If this bill is fraught with consequences so disastrous, so fatal to the prosperity of the country, it is time that its pregnant evils hould be portrayed, and for one he was most anxious to have this measure examined, and thoroughly considered, for he had regarded it in an entirely different light from the Senator from Kentucky; and if the effects of this measure would be more calamitous to the country and ruinous than a war with the most potent power on earth, it was high time that the people, and the representatives of the people and of the States, should be enlightened, so that they may discover the alarming, but hidden, evils of this all important measure The fact stated by the Senator furnishes no reason for delay, but presents every inducement for immediate action. Another consideration has been named by the Senator from Kentucky, which he thinks of sufficient importance to induce the friends of this bill to postpone it for the present, and that is, that the Senate should first receive information from the Legislatures, now in session, before they take up the bill. He has informed the Senate, that the Legislatures of a number of States are now considering this very subject, and that the Senate should delay action until these Legislatures are heard from.

The Senator says he wants to hear from Richmond and from Albany before he acts. This suggestion ought not to delay the action of the Senate. There was no certainty that the Legislatures would adopt any definite resolutions in relation to the subject. If they did, they would have, and they should have, an influence upon the course of those Senators who might receive instructions from the people through the State Legislatures. When instructions arrived, he had no doubt that they would be treated by the members of this body with all the respect to which they would be entitled. The question is, should the fact of the pendency of this subject before the State Legislatures deter the Senate from performing its duty? The discussion here on this interesting subject may have an influence elsewhere. He was for going forward, to do what ought to be done, and leave the action and the consequences of the action of the Senate for the consideration and judgment of the people.

The Senator from Kentucky has urged as a further reason why the Senate ought not now to proceed, that this bill should have originated in the House of Representatives.

The Senator says that things of late seem greatly changed; that the Senate of the United States recently has became the originator of important measures, which ought to have had their origin in that branch of the Government nearest to the people; that the long settled and approved practice of the legislative branches of the Government in relation to the commencement of the public business, has undergone a great revolution. Does the recollection of the Senator well serve him? Does he not remember that the compromise bill, and the bill for rechartering the Bank of the United States, measures near and dear to that honorable Senator, had their origin in the Senate of the United States? Is it not known that the latter measure was actually forced through the House of Representatives without debate, by the power of the previous question? And is it not within the recollection of every man present, that other most important measures have had their origin in the Senate? He would refer gentlemen to the memorable articles of impeachment which were presented against the late President of the United States. They had their origin in this branch of the Government. Each branch has ever acted, and will continue to act, upon its own responsibility. Each branch of the legislative power of Congress will originate such business as may be deemed proper and expedient, consistent with their limitations upon their power as expressed in the Constitution. There can be no doubt that it was entirely competent for the Senate to have originated this bill. The measure is within their jurisdiction; and it is in no sense interfering with the rights of the House of Representatives for the Senate to have presented to their consideration, and to the consideration of the American people, this particular measure.

The Senator advises that the friends of this bill in the Senate should not proceed to act until they shall have heard from the House of Representatives, as this body passed at the last session a bill less objectionable than the one now before the Senate; and that bill was, by a vote of the House, laid upon its table. This furnishes no reason for delay. The Senate is bound to do its duty, and leave the House of Representatives to do theirs. But he entirely differed from the Senator from Kentucky in supposing that this particular measure was more objectionable than that. He, for one, believed that this bill now before the Senate would be found more acceptable (so far as relates to details) to the American people than that. There was not, however, any difference in principle between the two bills; they both looked to an entire separation of the Government from banks in the collection and disbursement of the public revenue; they both looked to an important change in the character of the currency in which that revenue was hereafter to be collected and disbursed.

He had noticed all the reasons which the Senator had presented, and which he had regarded as sufficient to induce the friends of this measure to postpone for the present its consideration. As one of the friends of this bill, he must say that the reasons stated are far from satisfying his mind as to the propriety of the wished-for postponement. He considered them as furnishing powerful inducements for immediate action; and he trusted, after what the Senator had said, that there would be no further opposition to the adoption of his motion.

The previous orders were now postponed, and the bill taken up.

Mr. WRIGHT then addressed the Senate in a speech of considerable length, explaining and advocating the provisions and objects of the bill, and answering the objections to it; after which,

On motion of Mr. KING,

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which, it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, Feb. 1, 1838.

Mr. RHETT called the attention of the Chair to the omission of his name in the vote of yesterday, on the amendment of Mr. BELL on the Mississippi election case. Mr. R. had voted in the negative, and the House directed the correction to be made, thereby making the result—yeas 119, nays 113.

Reports from committees were then called for.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD reported Senate bill with an amendment, for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Morfitt, deceased.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. PARKER reported unfavorably on the claim of Lewis Evans; and on his motion, it was referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. FAIRFIED reported a bill for the relief of Alexander Scott.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. ADAMS on the 18th ult.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a copy and translation of the pamphlet, in the Spanish language, stated in the report of the Secretary of State to this House to have been printed and circulated by the late minister from the Republic of Mexico, Gorostiza, before his departure from this country, and the name of the diplomatic functionary from a foreign Government who communicated a copy of said pamphlet to the Secretary of State.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HOWARD to strike out all that part relating to the name of the diplomatic functionary, after the word "country," in the eighth line.

Mr. ADAMS, who was entitled to the floor, proceeded with his remarks upon the resolution until the expiration of the morning hour, when

The CHAIR announced the special order of the day.

Mr. JENIFER made an unsuccessful effort to induce the House to take up on their first and second reading, sundry bills from the Senate lying on the Speaker's table, merely for their commitment to the appropriate committees.

MISSISSIPPI EEECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Mississippi election case, the question being on the amended resolution of Mr. BELL adopted by the House yesterday.

"Resolved, That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F.H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, be rescinded, and that Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE are not duly elected members of the 25th Congress."

The question pending was on the following amendment of Mr. HOWARD:

"And that Messrs Prentiss and Word are not entitled to seats in this House as members of the 25th Congress, and that their seats be declared vacated, and that the Speaker of this House inform the Governor of Mississippi of that fact."

Mr. UNDERWOOD being entitled to the floor, he gave way to

Mr. HOWARD, who modified his amendment as follows:

"Resolved, That Samuel S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word are not members of the Twenty-fifth Congress."

Mr. H. said, if that amendment should be agreed to by the House, he should then move the following, as an addition:

"Resolved, That the Speaker of this House do communicate a copy of the above resolutions to the Governor of the State of Mississippi."

Mr. UNDERWOOD again gave way to

Mr. POPE who read, and stated his intention to submit the following amendment:

"And further resolved, That ARCHIBALD YELL is not entitled to a seat in this House, as a member of the twenty-fifth Congress, and that the seat of the representative from the State of Arkansas be, and the same is hereby, declared to be vacant, and that the Speaker of this House inform the Governor of the State of Arkansas of that fact."

The CHAIR remarked that the proposition being on a subject having no connection with that under consideration, was not in order.

The question being then propounded on the amendment of Mr. HOWARD as modified—

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired of the CHAIR if the question was not susceptible of division, of striking out and inserting, as he had reason to believe the CHAIR had reviewed his decision in the negative last night.

The CHAIR stated that since the adjournment of the House last evening, he had conferred with the gentleman from Kentucky himself, with a member from Massachusetts and others, and had carefully reviewed his decision, which had been hastily given. His opinion was based upon the "Parliamentary Manual," but the forty-first rule of the House laid down a different doctrine, and by another rule of the House it was provided that the "Manual" should be the law, where it did not conflict with the rules. The rule, therefore, having the preference, the Chair accordingly now decided that the question was susceptible of division.

Some conversation ensued between the CHAIR and Mr. BELL as to an incidental point of order; but no action grew out of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then proceeded to address the House in opposition to Mr. HOWARD's amendment, and against sending the election back to the people of Mississippi.

Mr. CILLEY followed in reply.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out the word "not," in Mr. HOWARD's amendment, so as to declare affirmatively that Messrs. Prentiss and Word were entitled to their seats.

Mr. TILLINGHAST then spoke at length in support of Messrs. Prentiss and Word, and against returning the election to the people.

Mr. MASON of Virginia gave his reasons at length for the course he advocated some days since, for sending the election back.

Mr. MENIFEE replied to Mr. MASON, and insisted that Messrs. Prentiss and Word were the duly elected members.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana was in favor of a reference of the case back to the people, and gave the reasons of his opinion at length.

Mr. HOWARD explained the effect of his amendment, which was to negative the claims of all the parties, and send the election back.

Mr. WHITE moved an adjournment: lost—ayes 80, noes 104.

Mr. PRENTISS replied to Messrs. MASON and WHITE, and argued at length against the proposition of reference to the people.

The House then adjourned.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE GLOBE.

I have seen in several newspapers an account of the debate on Mr. CALHOUN's resolutions, in which is a mistake as it regards my colleague (Mr. ALLEN;) I am made to refer to Mr. ALLEN as denying the right of trial by jury, to persons claimed as fugitive slaves. I have no recollection that Mr. ALLEN said any thing on that subject. My remark was made in reply to Mr. YOUNG, and his name ought to be where Mr. ALLEN's has been placed by mistake. This is my recollection of the matter, and justice to my colleague, (Mr. ALLEN) requires of me this explanation.

THO. MORRIS.

Mr. MORRIS also presented several petitions signed by men, and some signed by women, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and moved that the petitions be received.

Mr. WHITE moved that the motion to receive these petitions be laid on the table: carried.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which the subject had been refefred by a resolution of the Senate, reported a bill setting apart a tract of land on the western borders of Missouri and Arkansas as bounty lands for persons engaged for a term of years in the defence of the frontiers. The bill was read and ordered to a second reading; and the report of the committee accompanying the bill, with the documents, was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. FULTON, fifteen hundred extra copies of the report and documents were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of John Rodgers.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, the Committee on Pensions was authorized to employ a clerk.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, unfavorable to the petition of Charles G. Hunter, was taken up and considered, and, on motion of Mr. WALL, laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the bill supplementary to the act to amend the judiciary system of the United States was taken up; and after being amended, on motion of Messrs. SEVIER and LINN, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. KING moved to take up the report of the Secretary of War on the examinations of White and Black river, in Arkansas; which was agreed to, and the same was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following resolution, which lies one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate the report or statement made to him by Captain M. C. Perry, on the subject of the light house system of the United States.

Mr. SEVIER submitted the following resolution, which lies one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the state and condition of the Orphans' Court in the county of Washington, and to ascertain what legislation may be necessary in relation thereto, with power to send for persons and papers.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

The Senate took up the bill to impose additional duties as depositaries upon certain public officers, and to appoint Receivers General of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public moneys of the United States.

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate in a speech of considerable length, in opposition to the bill.

The amendments submitted yesterday by Mr. WRIGHT, one to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to hire, temporarily, suitable rooms for the offices of the Receivers General, and the other providing that the receipts given by the Treasurer, authorized by the 2d section, for money deposited for the purchase of land, shall not be negotiable by transfer or assignment, were severally adopted.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend the bill by striking out the 21st section, which relates to funding the surplus that may be in the Treasury, when it exceeds four millions, by investment in State or United States securities, bearing interest.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had, in the course of his explanations of the bill yesterday, stated that this provision was introduced to obviate the objections of those who contended that the bill would have the effect to accumulate money in the Treasury. He had nothing farther to say on the subject now, than to request that the question on the amendment might be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he had read the bill with great care, and considered it exceedingly well drawn, and calculated to produce the most beneficial effects. But this provision he considered not in accordance with its general principles, and he therefore wished it to be struck out. One of the most important objects of this measure was to avoid having a surplus. He thought, therefore, it would improve the bill to strike out the section.

The question was then taken, and Mr. CALHOUN's motion was adopted, yeas 24, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Walker, Wall, White, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Williams, and Wright—13.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in; and the question then being on engrossing the bill for a third reading,

Mr. BUCHANAN called for the yeas and nays on this question; which were ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved to fill up the blank in the twenty-eighth section with $10,000, for the purchase of a site and construction of an office for the Receiver General at St. Louis, and for fitting up rooms in the custom-house at Charleston, S. C. for the same purpose; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. moved to fill the blank for the salary of the Receiver General at New York, with the sum of $3,000.

Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays on this question; which being ordered, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Webster, and White—17.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved to fill up the blanks in the eighth, ninth, and eleven lines, for the salaries of the Receivers General at Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, with the sum of $2,500 each; which was agreed to without a division.

Mr. RIVES then said that he had the project of an amendment, which he designed to offer. He had not anticipated, nor did he suppose any gentleman had, that any question would be taken so early, and, therefore, was not prepared with his amendment; but by to-morrow, if the Senate would indulge him so long, he would have the amendment ready.

Mr. CALHOUN suggested that the bill be passed over informally, by general consent, so that it might still retain its precedence on the orders; which was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of the legal representative of John J. Bulow, jr. deceased, was taken up on the motion of Mr. HUBBARD.

Mr. KING alluded to the commission that had been appointed by the Government to go into the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Territory of Florida, and ascertain the losses that had accrued, and to make a proper report thereon. These Commissioners had been through Alabama and Georgia, and had made a partial report, and would, no doubt, be prepared to make a report during the present session; or, indeed, if they did not, he would submit it to the gentleman from New Hampshire, whether it would not be better to wait until authentic reports were made by the persons selected for that purpose, than go blindly into the adoption of a measure which might hereafter be seized on as a precedent to obtain improper payments from Government. We all know, (said Mr. K.) how these things are gotten up; the statements were generally ex parte, and would always present the fairest side on the part of the petitioner. Let us, then, wait until we hear from the Commissioners, who would have an opportunity of cross-examining witnesses, etc. and ascertaining from the facts, as they occurred on the spot, whether the property ought to be paid for or not.

Mr. HUBBARD contended that the case came clearly within the principle establised by the law of 1816, and he believed on that subject there was no diversity of opinion. He had examined the case with some care, and he thought the evidence conclusive, at least it was so to his mind. Another reason why it ought to be acted on, was that further legislation would be necessary before the commission alluded could act, as every dollar of the appropriation was exhausted.

Mr. SEVIER wished to know on what principle this money was claimed? Were the troops in possession of the House at the time it was destroyed, and if not, how long had it been evacuated? He wished some uniform principle established on the subject, as there was a vast amount of property ruined in Florida, and numerous applications would doubtless be presented to Congress. Mr. S. offered an amendment to the effect that the destruction of the building should be in consequence of the occupancy by the United States troops.

Mr. DAVIS, though friendly to the claimant, because he believed that he had been subjected to great loss, yet thought it better to wait for all the facts. The bill, as it stood, involved principles that he was not disposed to sanction.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company was taken up, and after being amended, by striking out "forty" and inserting "twenty" [the number of years for the duration of the charter,] it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, Febuary 2, 1838.

The CHAIR laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, communicating the ninth annual report of the Board of Commissioners of the penitentiary at Washington, D. C.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, laid on the table.

Reports from standing committees were then called for.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that, some time since, the Committee of Ways and Means had reported adversely against sundry memorials of claimants under the Neapolitan indemnity, praying Congress either to authorize the purchase of stock, or the issuing of stock in exchange for it. Against these two propositions, the committee had reported.

In one of the memorials there was a third proposition, that the claimants should be authorized to sell the indemnity and become their own agents for its disposal, to which Mr. C. supposed there would be no objection. It was an inquiry, however, belonging not to the Committee of Ways and Means, but to that on Foreign Affairs, and he, therefore, moved that the former be discharged from that portion of the subject, and that it be referred to the latter; which was agreed to.

Mr. RENCHER reported adversely on the memorial of Richard Clay and James Lowell; which was laid on the table.

CLAIMS.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio reported Senate bill, with a recommendation that it do not pass, for the relief of Caroline E. Clitherell.

COMMERCE.

Mr. SMITH moved that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the number and compensation of officers of the customs, be printed for the use of the House; which was agreed to.

POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY reported a bill to provide for additional clerks in the Post Office Department, in the Auditor's office connected therewith, and for other purposes.

JUDICIARY.

Mr. TOUCEY made an unfavorable report on the petition of Abraham Morrison.

On motion of Mr. TOUCEY, the unfavorable report made some days since in the case of Thomas Chapman, was recommitted to that committee.

Mr. CILLEY reported a bill for the relief of John H. Shepherd, administrator of Abiah Wool.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. HARLAN reported a bill to limit the operation of the third section of the act of the 4th of March, 1829, entitled "An act confirming the reports of the register and receiver of the land office of the district of St. Stephens, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes."

Mr. HARLAN also reported a resolution directing the Committee on Private Land Claims to inquire into the expediency of reviving, for a limited time, the act of the 26th of May, 1824, entitled "an act to enable claimants to land within the limits of the State of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," and the act relating to the same of the 24th of May, 1828; which was concurred in.

Mr. LOOMIS made an unfavorable report on the memorial of Eli Hallbay, which was laid on the table; but, at the request of Mr. LEGARE, the report was withdrawn, and again referred to the committee.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. PENNYBACKER made an unfavorable report in the case of Basil Brown; which was laid on the table.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. M'CLELLAN of New York reported a bill for the relief of Frederick Sammons.

Mr. SMITH made an unsuccessful effort to induce the House to take up sundry bills from the Senate, with a view to their commitment to the appropriate committees.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. ADAMS on the 18th ult.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a copy and translation of the pamphlet, in the Spanish language, stated in the report of the Secretary of State to this House to have been printed and circulated by the late minister from the Republic of Mexico, Gorostiza, before his departure from this country, and the name of the diplomatic functionary from a foreign Government who communicated a copy of said pamphlet to the Secretary of State.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HOWARD to strike out all that part relating to the name of the diplomatic functionary, after the word "country," in the eighth line.

Mr. ADAMS, who was entitled to the floor, proceeded with his remarks, and contended that the cases he had heretofore cited were much more offensive to the Government than the publication of the pamphlet by Mr. Gorostiza; that the Government then pursued a very different course from the course pursued now; that our Government was wrong in the position it had assumed, and that it must retrace its steps; that the position the Administration had pursued, was calculated to prevent our citizens from obtaining the claims which they had upon Mexico; and that the perpetual appeal by our Government to Jones Thuraeler, ill comported with its former course of action. Mr. A. went into considerable details as to the course of our Government formerly, and contended that the Administration must retrace the steps it had taken. He also contended that the name of the diplomatic functionary who communicated Gorostiza's pamphlet to the Secretary of State, ought to be communicated, not merely from the fact of his having communicated it, but from the remark which had accompanied it. He trusted that the House would permit the name of this diplomatic functionary to be given; but at any rate he hoped the resolution would not be rejected, but that it would be adopted speedily.

Mr. HOWARD said, as the gentleman from Massachusetts had concluded his remarks with an expression that the House would decide this question immediately, he would not detain it long. He would have been willing, at the outset of the gentleman's remarks, that the House should have decided the question, without further debate upon this collateral point, which he did not think of very much consequence, and which had already occupied too much of the time of the House. But, as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) had seen proper to present his views to the body somewhat at length, Mr. H. trusted the House would excuse him for delaying them some little time further, while he endeavored, as well as he could, to reply to the remarks of the gentleman. The gentleman from Massachusetts had made a request of him that he would withdraw the amendment to strike out that part of the resolution calling for a communication of the name of the diplomatic functionary who transmitted Mr. Gorostiza's pamphlet to the Secretary of State; and it was with great pain that he (Mr. H.) ever refused a request coming from that gentleman. In consequence of a repetition of that request he had re-examined the subject, and still he was unable to come to the conclusions which his wish to gratify the gentleman from Massachusets would lead him. He was, therefore, after full examination, compelled to adhere to his first resolution, and urge upon the House the adoption of his amendment, as he was unable to see any good which would result from a communication of the name of the diplomatic functionary alluded to. He was unable to see any sufficient reason for this House to exercise the high power which it possessed of bringing from the recesses of the Department of State the name of a particular individual who had done an act so simple as this. It struck him that in whatever point of view you looked upon this matter, whether as impugning the veracity of the Secretary of State, or as an offence in the Minister who communicated this pamphlet, that no good could result from the adoption of this part of the resolution. The House, perhaps, might have a curiosity to know the name of this individual, or the gentleman from Massachusetts might feel a curiosity to know it; but he would ask, if that was a sufficient reason to induce the House to make a formal call for this information without there being any good likely to result from it? He must, therefore, adhere to his first opinion, and insist upon the vote of the House upon his amendment.

Before proceeding further, Mr. H. deemed it proper that he should be correctly understood in relation to a point of difference between himself and the colleague of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. CUSHING.) Mr. H. said that when this resolution first came up before the House, he had stated a belief that the pamphlet in question—Gorostiza's pamphlet—had been circulated very freely through this country; that it was for sale in the bookstores of this city; that he himself had purchased a copy of it from a bookstore, and read it; and he, therefore, saw no necessity for procuring another translation of it, unless it was correct, as was suspected by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. CUSHING,) that this translation of it was not a genuine one. He, however, had stated that he had no objection to having the pamphlet communicated in an official form from the Department of State. The colleague of the gentleman from Massachusetts had expressed the opinion, when he addressed the House, that the pamphlet which was for sale was not an entire translation of the original pamphlet published by Gorostiza, and gentlemen would well remember the force of this remark.

Now, in order to set himself right, Mr. H. said that he held in his hand one of the original pamphlets, as he had good reason to believe; he, to be sure, had not a personal knowledge of this fact, but he had such a knowledge of it as satisfied him that the pamphlet he now held in his hand was one of those issued by Mr. Gorostiza. He also held in his hand a translation, which he had purchased in this city, and he had gone over them page by page with a gentleman who was well acquainted with the Spanish language, and he found every sentence and paragraph in the translation which was in the original, except two orders of Gen. Gaines, which were not material, and which had been published in the papers of this city. With these two exceptions, the English edition corresponded every where with the Spanish, so that he believed it was a mistake in supposing that the translation was imperfect. He would say further, that perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) may have been led into the error into which he had fallen by the circumstance that another pamphlet which he (Mr.H.) had seen, was defective, in having one sheet omitted. It was possible, therefore, that one of these defective pamphlets had fallen into the hands of the gentleman. Sir, in this way he may have been led into the error. If this was the case, the gentleman was very correct in saying that the copy of the pamphlet which he read was not a correct translation from the original. Mr. H. did not therefore at all wish to be understood as impugning the veracity of the gentleman from Massachusetts; neither did he consider the gentleman as impugning his veracity; and he (Mr. H.) corrected the error which he conceived the gentleman had fallen into, merely for the purpose of making good his own assertion, that the pamphlet to be obtained at the bookstores was a perfect translation of the Spanish copy published by Mr. Gorostiza. Notwithstanding this, he had no disposition to oppose the adoption of the resolution, further than to urge upon the House the adoption of his amendment. The gentleman from Massachusetst (Mr. ADAMS.) had gone into a great many details to make out a satisfactory case to the House, which he had done, no doubt, to the satisfaction of the House, but he (Mr. H.) should attempt to-morrow to show—as he had not time to do it to-day—the hour having expired—that the cases presented by the gentleman, were not similar to the case now before the House.

The CHAIR here announced the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication fsom the Postmaster General, transmitting a report, in part of the contracts by that department, in 1837.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BOON renewed the request previously made by Mr. SMITH to take up, and refer the bills from the Senate on the Speaker's table, but it was objected to.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Mississippi Election case, the question being on the amended resolution of Mr. BELL adopted by the House yesterday.

"Resolved, That the resolution of this House of 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, be rescinded, and that Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE are not duly elected members of the 25th Congress."

The question was on the following amendment of Mr. HOWARD:

"Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress."

And the pending question on the amendment to the amendment, proposed by Mr. ROBERTSON, to strike therefrom the word "not."

Mr. PATTON was entitled to the floor, but he yielded it to

Mr. PRENTISS, who again addressed the House against the proposition to send the election back to the people.

Mr. YELL gave a statement of the circumstances producing his second election, which amounted to the fact that it was voluntary on his part, for he held his July election to have been a good one, and for the whole term of the 25th Congress.

Mr. GHOLSON made a brief statement to the House, to the following effect: His colleague and himself were not before the people at the November election, and they distinctly stated to the people, in a printed circular addressed to them, that they were not candidates upon that occasion. That circular was published, and it was announced, at least in all the Democratic papers in the State, that they were not candidates. Mr. G. also wrote at least a hundred letters to his friends in different parts of the State, declaring that, in consequence of that decision, he was not a candidate.

Mr. G. further stated that, in twenty counties, where no votes were given for himself and his colleague in the November election, they received about five thousand votes at that of July; thus showing, conclusively, that there was no general turn out of the people at the November election, induced, as he firmly believed, not to vote by the decision of the House. That was the main fact he wished to state. The House, by its vote, had said the election of July was void. Mr. G. was as well satisfied with that decision as any one else, but he wished them to vote, at least, with a knowledge of the facts.

In addition, Mr. G. had good grounds to know that the election in many other counties was partial, from the fact of his colleague and himself not being before the people, and therefore, by no kind of calculation, was the strength of parties tested in November. The people had been misled by the decision of the House.

Mr. G. said his physical debility rendered him unable, if he was otherwise able, to go into the argument, and would conclude with the hope that the House would take the vote as early as practicable.

Mr. PATTON addressed the House, at length, in opposition to Mr. HOWARD's amendment, and was followed by Mr. LEGARE in reply.

Mr. BIDDLE then took the floor, and spoke at length in support of the claim of Messrs. Prentiss and Word, and against the reference of the case back to the people.

Mr. MENIFEE obtained the floor, but before proceeding with his remarks, moved an adjournment.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 90, nays 118.

So the House refusing to adjourn—

Mr. MENIFEE proceeded with his remarks in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LEGARE) and others, and contending that Messrs. Prentiss and Word were constitutionally elected, and entitled to seats in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BELL next obtained the floor, but without proceeding with his remarks, moved an adjournment, which was carried; and

The House adjourned.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution, which lies over one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the Senate, in such manner as he may deem proper, all the correspondence recently received and had between this and the Government of Great Britain and the State of Maine, on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, which, in his opinion, may be communicated consistently with the public interest.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose and addressed the Senate for some time in opposition to the general principles of the bill.

Messrs. CLAYTON, DAVIS and GRUNDY supported the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to recommit the bill to the Committee with instructions to bring in a new bill, referring the matter to the Third Auditor.

After some further remarks from Messrs. DAVIS, WILLIAMS and GRUNDY, the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative; yeas 23, nays 17.

Pending the discussion of the above bill,

Mr. WRIGHT asked the Senate by unanimous consent to take up the Sub-Treasury bill with a view of allowing the Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) an opportunity of offering his amendment; which was agreed to: when; Mr. R. offered an amendment which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RIVES proposed the following amendment to the bill "to impose additional duties as depositaries upon certain public officers, to appoint Receivers General of Public Money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys of the United States," viz:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the number of banks authorized by the act of June 23, 1836, to be employed as depositories of the public money, shall not exceed twenty five, (any thing in the said act to the contrary notwithstanding;) that they shall be chosen from among the most solid and respectable banks in the States or Territories in which they are established, and their locality, as well as number, shall be determined purely with reference to the wants and convenience of the Treasury in conducting its fiscal operations.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall be so selected or employed, which shall not pay its bills and notes, and all other demands upon it, promptly in specie, when required; nor until it shall first have furnished to the Secretary of the Treasury a statement of its condition and business, a list of its directors and officers, a copy of its charter, and such other information as he may require, to enable him to judge of the soundness of its condition.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the banks to be employed as depositories as aforesaid, shall be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury in the following manner, to wit: if the selection be made during the session of Congress, it must, before it take effect, be first approved by joint resolution of both Houses; and if made during the recess, it shall be submitted to Congress, at the commencement of their next session, to be in like manner confirmed or annulled by them.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said bank, before they shall be employed as the depositories of the public money, shall agree to receive the same on the following terms and conditions, to wit:

First. Each bank shall furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, statements setting forth its condition and business, as prescribed in the second section of this act, except that such statements need not contain a copy of the charter of the bank; and the said banks shall furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Treasurer of the United States a weekly statement of the condition of his account on their books; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the right, by himself, or an agent appointed for that purpose, to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank as shall relate to the staid statements: Provided, That this shall not be construed to imply the right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank.

Secondly. To credit as specie all sums deposited therein to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, (excepting Treasury notes, or other Government obligations, that may be receivable in payment of public dues, and which are properly chargeable to the United States,) and to pay all checks, warrants, or drafts, drawn on such depositesites, in specie, if required by the holder thereof.

Thirdly. To give, whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States and the Territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions or claiming allowance on account of difference of exchange.

Fourthly. To render to the Government of the United States all the duties and services heretofore required by law to be performed by the late Bank of the United States and its several branches or offices.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby authorized, and it shall be his duty, whenever, in his judgment, the same shall be necessary or proper, to require of any bank, selected and employed as aforesaid, collateral or additional securities for the safe-keeping of the public moneys deposited therein, and the faithful performance of the duties required by this act.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts, in the name, and for and on behalf of the United States, with the said banks so selected and employed, whereby the said banks shall stipulate to do and perform the several duties and services prescribed by this act.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no bank which shall be employed as a depository of the public money, shall be discontinued as such, or the public money be withdrawn therefrom, except for he causes hereinafter mentioned; that is to say: if, at any time, any of the said banks shall refuse, or fail to perform any of the duties prescribed by this act, and stipulated to be performed by its contract, or if any of the said banks shall at any time refuse to pay its notes in specie, or if the Secretary of the Treasury shall have reason to believe that any of the said banks is no longer a safe place of deposite for the public moneys; in any and every such case, it shall be his duty to discontinue such bank as a depository, and withdraw from it the public moneys which it may hold on deposite; and, in case of the discontinuance of any of the said banks, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress immediately, if in session, and if not in session, at the commencement of its next session, the facts and reasons which have induced such discontinuance: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent Congress, at any time, from passing any law for the removal of the public money from any of the said banks, or from changing the terms of deposite, or to prevent the said banks at any time, from ceasing to act as depositories of the public money, upon paying over, or tendering to pay, the whole amount of public moneys on hand, according to the terms of their agreement with the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the banks selected as depositories of the public money, to make settlements with all the banks in their vicinity with which they have transactions, as often as once a week; and the balances due shall be demanded or paid, as the case may be, in specie, whenever and to whatever extent such requisition, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be deemed necessary to check a tendency to over-issues, and to preserve the soundness of the currency.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt all such means as he can properly employ, to induce the banks selected as depositories of the public money, to enter into mutual arrangements for receiving and crediting as cash in payment of the public dues the notes of each other, whenever the same may be offered in such payments.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the revenue of the United States, whether arising from duties, taxes, debts, postages, or sales of lands, shall be collected and received in gold and silver, or in Treasury notes, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal coins of the United States, subject to the following restrictions and conditions in regard to the receipt of bank notes, to wit: from and after the expiration of one year from the passage of this act, the notes of no banks which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars, shall be received in payment of the public dues; and from and after the expiration of two years thereafter, the notes of no banks which shall issue or circulate bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars shall be so receivable; Provided, however, that the notes of no bank whatever shall be received in payment of the public dues by the collectors or receivers of the public money which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash; and Provided, also, that the notes of no bank which now fails, or may hereafter fail, to redeem its notes in gold and silver, shall, at any time, be received in payment of the public dues, unless such bank shall, on or before the first day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, have bona fide resumed payments in specie.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That nothing in the preceding section shall be so construed as to prohibit receivers or collectors of the dues of the Government from receiving for the public lands, any kind of land scrip or Treasury certificates now authorized by law, but the same shall hereafter be received for the public lands in the same way and manner as has been heretofore practiced; and it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make any discrimination in the funds receivable between the different branches of the public revenue, except as is provided in this section.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall be employed as a depository of the public money which shall not conform, as to the denomination of notes issued or circulated by it, to the condition herein before imposed on those banks whose paper is allowed to be received in payment of the public dues.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to lay before Congress, at the commencement of each annual session, and as often thereafter as either House may require, a statement of the number and names of the banks employed as depositories of the public money, and of their condition, and the amount of public money deposited in each, as shown by their returns at the Treasury, with every other particular which may assist Congress in forming a satisfactory judgment of the safety of the public moneys, and of the soundness and responsibility of the depositories to which they are committed.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That all acts, and parts of acts, coming within the purview of this act, are hereby repealed.

The bill supplementary to the act to amend the act relative to the judicial system of the United States was read a third time and passed.

The Senate then adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, Feb. 3, 1838.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting two hundred and fifty-five copies of the Army Register.

On motion of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, laid on the table.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of the contracts entered into by the Navy Commissioners during the year 1837.

On motion of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, laid on the table.

Mr. McKIM moved that the bills from the Senate on the Speaker's table be taken up, with a view to their reference to the appropriate committees.

Objection being made,

Mr. BOON said he should be compelled to move a suspension of the rule, for some of the bills had been lying on the Speaker's table for several days. Whereupon, the objection was withdrawn, and the following bills were taken up, read twice, and referred:

An act for the relief of the heirs of Francis Neuman, late collector of the internal revenue and direct tax in Maryland.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY moved its reference to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. McKIM moved it to the Committe of Ways and Means.

Mr. WHITTLESEY had no great objection, though that class of cases had been generally committed to the former committee.

Mr. McKIM's motion was agreed to.

An act for the legal adjudication and settlement of claims for land under the grants or concessions made to Baron Bastrop, Marquis de Baton Rouge, and others in Louisiana, and to Elisha Williams and others in Arkansas.

On motion of Mr. LAWLER, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

An act granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands.

On motion of Mr. BOON, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

An act to amend the act of the 3d of March, 1837, entitled, an act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. TALIAFERRO, the morning business was set aside, to proceed with the special order.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Mississippi election case, the question being on the amended resolution of Mr. BELL, adopted by the House yesterday.

"Resolved, That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, be rescinded, and that Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE are not duly elected members of the 25th Congress."

The question was on the following amendment of Mr. HOWARD:

"Resolved, That Sergeant S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word, are not members of the Twenty-fifth Congress."

And the pending question on the amendment to the amendment, proposed by Mr. ROBERTSON, to strike therefrom the word "not."

Mr. BELL, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at some length in support of the claim of Messrs. Prentiss and Word to seats in the House of Representatives, and against sending the election back to the people.

Mr. RHETT addressed the House briefly in reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) and in support of the proposition to send the election back to the people. He contended that the people of Mississippi had representatives on the floor of the House at the extra session by the decision of the House itself, and that decision being considered as binding upon the people, the election of November was a one-sided election; therefore he would send it back to the people, so that a fair election might be had.

Mr. CUSHING then made an explanation in relation to his objections at the commencement of the extra session to the system of organizing the House, by the Clerk calling over a list of members of the House, cut from the newspapers, and presumed to be elected members thereof.

Mr. POPE addressed the House at some length, going into a constitutional argument to prove that the Governor of Mississippi had no right to order an election to be held in July; that it was unconstitutional and void, and had been decided so the other day by the House, by rescinding the resolution of the House of October last. The election, then, held in November, which was in conformity to the Constitution and laws of the State of Mississippi, must be considered as good by this House; therefore, the members here claiming seats, Messrs. Prentiss and Word, ought to be decided as entitled to seats.

Mr. MARTIN obtained the floor; but, without proceeding, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOPKINS called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 108, nays 90.

So the House adjourned, at 5 o'clock, p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, February 5, 1838.

The CHAIR laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the report and survey of George's bank and shoals, accompanied by two charts, one of George's shoal, and the other of the bank.

Mr. Smith, remarking that the printing of the charts having been ordered some days since, in the concurrence of a resolution to that effect from the Committee on Commerce, moved that the communication be now laid on the table; which was agreed to.

Petitions and memorials being then in order—

Mr. HAYNES moved to postpone the morning business, for the purpose of proceeding with the Mississippi election case.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the people of the United States might be allowed to be heard at least once in three weeks; and he therefore asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. H's motion, but they were refused; and the motion itself was rejected without a division.

Petitions and memorials were then presented by Messrs. CUSHMAN, ATHERTON and WILLIAMS, of New Hampshire.

[Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of Samuel Roley for pension arrearages; and the petition of Francis Lambert for compensation for medical services rendered the Washington Volunteers.]

[Mr. CUSHMAN presented petitions of John B. Hill and Elijah Davis, praying for pensions; and of John Crawford and Rhoda Gale, praying for increase of pensions; all of which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.]

Messrs. PARMENTER, CUSHING, FLETCHER REED, BRIGGS, LINCOLN, CALHOUN, PHILLIPS, and ADAMS of Massachusetts.

[Mr. PARMENTER presented the petition of Josiah Brackett and 276 other legal voters of Charlestown, Massachusetts; of Ebenezer Newhall and 24 others, of Lincoln, Massachusetts; of Sarah B. Newhall and 46 others, of Lincoln, Massachusetts; of James Kimball and 65 men, and Rachel Kimball and 107 women, of Lincoln, Massachusetts, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Also, the petition of Sarah B. Newhall and 46 others, against the annexation of Texas. Also, the remonstrance of Betsey Kelsey and 54 other women, of Shirley, Massachusetts; of Sally Fletcher and 38 other women, of Carlisle, Massachusetts; of Hope Brown and 16 others, of Shirley, Massachusetts, against the resolution passed by the House of Representatives December 21st, in relation to petitions on the subject of slavery, and praying that said resolution may be rescinded. Mr. P. also presented the petition of the heirs of Timothy Page for compensation for Revolutionary services; and the memorial of the Major Commandant of the United States arsenal at Watertown, Massachusetts, in relation to the purchase of land for the use of the United States.]

[Mr. LINCOLN presented a memorial purporting to be signed by a number of legal voters of Massachusetts, asking that the resolution of the House of the 21st December last, ordering all Abolition memorials and other papers of a similar character on the table, be rescinded.

Mr. L. moved its reference to a select committee, with instructions to report a resolution declaring the other resolution to be a violation of the Constitutional guaranty of the right of petition in the people, and subversive of the freedom of debate in their representatives, and declaring said resolution to be rescinded.

Mr. PATTON raised the question of consideration.

Mr. BOON moved to lay that question on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. HOLSEY inquired if the petition would go on the table with the motion of consideration,

The CHAIR replied that the coherent accompanied the primary question.

Mr. WISE raised the point of order, whether the petition itself did not come under the operation of the resolution of the 21st of December?

The CHAIR thought not.

Mr. WISE. Was not the memorial substantially praying for what would open the whole subject of abolition?

The CHAIR was well advised of the point, which had been decided some weeks ago, immediately after the presentation of the first proposition of this character, since which several similar petitions had been offered, and the House had acquiesced in that decision. The Chair had no doubt that this petition was in order, and did not come within the operation of the resolution of the 21st December.

Mr. WISE. Then I must be permitted to say that, if that be the correct construction, that resolution was of no manner of use whatever.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 75.

So the question of reconsideration was laid on table.]

[All the members from Massachusetts presented petitions for the abolition of slavery, which went on the table under the order of the 21st of December; a number remonstrating against the annexation of Texas, and several praying the recission of said order, all of which took the same course on respective motions]

Before Mr. ADAMS had got through, the CHAIR announced the arrival of the hour for the special order.

Mr. ADAMS moved a suspension of the rule to enable him to present the petitions communicated to his charge, and asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOFFMAN would vote for the gentleman's motion, limited as it was; but he preferred its extension to all the other States behind Massachusetts.

Mr. ADAMS modified his motion according to Mr. H's suggestion, but the House refused the yeas and nays, and declined to suspend the rule.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Mississippi election case, the question being on the amended resolution of Mr. BELL adopted by the House on Wednesday last:

"Resolved, That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, be rescinded, and that Messrs GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE are not duly elected members of the 25th Congress."

The question was on the following amendment of Mr. HOWARD:

"Resolved, That Sergeant S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word are not members of the Twenty-fifth Congress."

And the pending question on the amendment to the amendment, proposed by Mr. ROBERTSON, to strike therefrom the word "not."

Mr. MARTIN of Alabama being entitled to the floor, rose to proceed with his remarks, but gave way to

Mr. GLASCOCK, who stated that he had this morning received from the Hon. Mr. CLAIBORNE a brief statement, in writing, of several important facts in relation to the question before the House, and which he considered essential should be read; and as the health of Mr. C. still prevented his attending in person, he (Mr. G.) felt it his duty to make the motion that the paper he then held in his hand be received, and read at the Clerk's table. It was due to the sitting members to say, that they wished no motion made to print.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5, 1838.

SIR: I herewith transmit to you the proceedings of the Democratic members of both branches of the Mississippi Legislature, which I desire may be laid before the House. At a moment when there is so much contrariety of opinion as to public sentiment in the State of Mississippi, and after the gentlemen who claim to supersede my colleague and myself, have expressed an opinion that not ten citizens of that State believe we are entitled to our seats for the whole of the twenty-fifth Congress, I am gratified at being able to furnish such evidence of the popular will. It must be recollected that the gentlemen who attended this meeting compose a majority of the Legislature, and that they represent the opinions of a large body of the people. They are familiar with the history of this contested election from the emanation of the writ, down to the decision of the House in October, and the incidents subsequent thereto; they are fresh from communion with an enlightened constituency, and, in all probability, are better informed as to the real state of opinion, than either the honorable claimants, or ourselves, or representatives from other States. The names that appear on the face of those proceedings are among the most distinguished in the State for the high stations they occupy, for talents, for integrity, for all that can give impartiality to evidence or weight to character, and I trust their testimony, thus solemny and publicly rendered, will have its due influence with the House.

I feel bound to repeat, on this occasion, what I have before declared, that prior to the July election, my colleague and myself distinctly took the ground, that we considered the election as not for the special session only, but for two years. The papers friendly to us advanced the same opinion. When the decision of the House was made, confirming us in our seats for the entire 25th Congress, we addressed a Circular to the people, (which was widely distributed,) from which the following is an extract:

"TO THE PEOPLE OF MISSISSIPPI.

"FELLOW-CITIZENS: In July last, it is well known, we were elected under the Proclamation of the Governor, and according to the forms of the law, to represent you in Congress. When the Governor issued his writ, the opinion of the press and of the people, so far as we are informed or believe, was, that he had the power to do so: that the exigency of the times required him to exercise that power; but that he had no right to abridge the constitutional term of two years, for which members of Congress are elected; that so much of his writ was void, and that the members chosen would serve not only in the extra session, but throughout the twenty-fifth Congress. This was our own opinion. It was every where freely expressed by us, and we believe that nine-tenths of those who voted at the late [July] election went to the polls with such an impression."

The people were thus distinctly notified of the action of the House, and assured that we would continue to hold our seats.

Prevented as I am by the state of my health, from appearing in the House to vindicate the rights of those I represent, I feel bound to express my solemn conviction that a majority of the freemen of Mississippi acquiesced in the judgment of the House. I believe, upon evidence which would be conclusive in a court of justice, that the 6,500 citizens who sustained me in November, did not doubt the validity of the July election as conferring office for two years, or the binding effect of the decision of the House.

On the other hand, I know, as positively as any fact can be known, that upwards of 8,000 voters, chiefly in counties almost unanimously favorable to us, REFUSED to cast their votes a second time, on the ground that the judgment of the House was binding, and that they were satisfied with it. I have no doubt but that 15,000 freemen of Mississippi, if an opportunity offered, would at this moment sanction that judgment at the polls. I feel convinced they would declare that no vacancy could exist in the representation from that State, to be filled at the November election, after the decision of the House, the constitutional and only competent tribunal, that we were members of the whole 25th Congress. That decision was pronounced after searching and protracted examination; and upon the same evidence which is now before the House, it persuaded us that the whole matter was settled; it gave to the claimants the benefit of a canvass without opposition; it restrained 8,000 freemen from casting their votes; and should the House now decide finally against us, however highly its character is generally appreciated, the moral sense, the proper and honorable pride, of an enlightened people will revolt at the injustice of such a course.

If this was not my solemn conviction; if I was not, as I believe, fully informed as to the intentions of those who voted for me in July, and of their wishes and opinions now; if I could be convinced that the claimants received a majority of the whole number of votes cast at the November election—ex parte as that election was, and without opposing candidates—I would at once close this controversy by RESIGNING my seat. I feel satisfied that my colleague would pursue the same course. Although disfranchised by the House, and prevented from being candidates by their resolution declaring us members for two years, if the claimants had presented themselves here with a clear and properly ascertained majority, we would cheerfully have resigned our places, and submitted the matter to the people. Such, however, in my opinion, is not the case. I believe that the popular will in Mississippi was adverse to those gentlemen at the election, and that it is still so; and however my waning health or inclinations might otherwise influence me, my duty to those who have, for a series of years, sustained me with large and uniform majorities, will induce me to hold my seat until I am ejected by the verdict of the House. That verdict has been once recorded in our favor; and I trust the House will pause long before reversing it, and the rights and equities it carries with it. I trust it will deliberate long before it assumes the alarming prerogative of appointing others to the places that we hold by the votes and will of the PEOPLE OF A SOVEREIGN STATE.

Unable to defend my cause in person, or to assert with becoming spirit the views and opinions of a high-minded constituency, I appeal to the House, through you, for its dispassionate and impartial judgment. Regarding it as a tribunal too grave to be influenced by passion, and too just to render final judgment without positive knowledge of the facts, I appeal to it, not for my colleague and myself, but for those we represent; not for the empty honors of office, but for justice to a people jealous of any encroachments on their rights.

I have the honor to be,
Very respectfully,
Your obed't servant,
JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE.

To the Hon. THOS. GLASCOCK.

The following is a copy of the proceedings referred to in the above statement of Mr. CLAIBORNE:

Proceedings of a meeting of the Democratic members of the Legislature, and others of the party, then at the city of Jackson, held in the Senate Chamber on the evening of the 20th instant.

The meeting was organized by calling the Hon. George B. Augustus, Senator from Noxubbee, to the chair, as President of the meeting; General Arthur Fox, member from Lawrence, was elected Vice President; General A. G. Brown, member from Copiah, and Charles M. Price, were appointed Secretaries.

Mr. Besancon, President of the Board of Bank Commissioners, offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Whereas an attempt is being made against our worthy representatives in Congress, Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, by asserting that they were elected for the called session only, and not for the whole 25th Congress, and that they are not now the choice of the people of the State; and whereas, in the opinion of this meeting, Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson were and are at this time the choice of a large majority of the people of this State, therefore,

Resolved, That, as the people are satisfied with the decision of Congress in relation to the seats of our Representatives, this meeting is of the opinion that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson would disobey the wishes of a large majority of the people of this State by resigning their seats at this time.

Resolved, That the charge of deception which has been preferred against our Representatives, relative to the duration of their term of service, is entirely groundless and without foundation.

Resolved, That in voting for the separation of the Government from all banking institutions, and in voting against the proposition to charter a national bank, our Representatives have acted in conformity with the will of a large majority of the people of this State, and in so doing deserve well of their country.

On motion of Mr. Holland of Marshall,

Resolved, That the stand taken by our Senators and Representatives in Congress, against the discussion of slavery, meets our hearty approbation

On motion of General Brown of Copiah,

Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting, to resign their seats in Congress during its present session, Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson would leave the State entirely without representation in the popular branch of the National Legislature; and, therefore, the people do not wish or expect it.

On motion of Gen. Price, of Hinds,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed, to whom shall be submitted the resolutions adopted by this meeting, with instructions to draft an address to the people of Mississippi, more fully expressive of the opinions of this meeting.

The following named gentlemen were appointed to constitute said committee: Dr. Hancock of De Soto, L. A. Besancon of Natchez, V. C. Howard of Jackson, K. S. Holland of Marshall, and Felix H. Walker of De Soto.

On motion, the President, Vice President, and first Secretary, were added to the committee: the President made chairman of the committee.

On motion, Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Democratic papers of the State, and that a copy be forwarded to our representatives in Congress, signed by the officers of this meeting.

The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Tucker, Besancon, Holland, Brown, Harley, Fox, Howard, Butler, Runnells, Hancock, Stone, Walker, Dow, Granberry, and Ellis, respectively, with eloquence, power, and effect.

GEO. B. AUGUSTUS, President.
ARTHUR FOX, Vice President.

A. G. BROWN, Secretary.
CHARLES M. PRICE, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky inquired what paper the proceedings of the meeting of members of the Legislature of Mississippi was read from?

The CHAIR replied that the proceedings were read from the Globe of Thursday last.

Mr. WILLIAMS then asked that the introductory remarks of the editor of that paper be read by the Clerk.

Mr. OWENS and many other members objected.

The question was put, and the House refused to order the reading of the notice—ayes 80, noes 90.

Mr. GLASCOCK then stated that he held in his hand the original proceedings; but they being cut up into narrow slips at the printing office, he preferred sending the paper to the Chair to be read. He would, however, have the original read, if any gentleman doubted the correctness of the proceedings as published in the newspaper.

Mr. McKAY then rose, and proposed to the gentleman from Maryland, that as the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) on Saturday, had raised some critical objections to it, as being a mere truism, he hoped it would be modified so as to conform to former precedents of the House, declaring that the gentlemen claiming seats (Messrs. Prentiss and Word) were not entitled to seats as members of the 25th Congress.

Mr. HOWARD said that he had drafted his resolution in this way in the first place, but had modified it afterwards at the suggestion of some gentlemen on this floor. He had no objection, therefore, now to modify his proposition to meet the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina. Mr. H. then modified his amendment as follows: "and that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are not entitled to seats on this floor as members of the 25th Congress."

Mr. MARTIN, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at some length. He was of opinion that the sitting members were fairly elected at the election held in Mississippi in July last, under the writ of election issued by the Governor; and that, even if the Governor did attempt to limit that election to the called session, that the attempt was void, and the sitting members were entitled to their seats during the whole of the 25th Congress. The House so decided at the called session. The other day, however, it had virtually decided, by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the election of July should be set aside; and now it is demanded by gentlemen that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are entitled to seats on this floor, because they were elected in November last. The election of November, however, (Mr. M. contended) was a one-sided election, the applicants for seats here being the only candidates, and they not receiving one-half of the votes cast at that election for State officers. Under these circumstances, he thought they could not claim to represent the people of Mississippi. He considered it a dangerous precedent for this House to reverse the solemn decision of the House made at the called session; but if that decision was reversed, he contended that the only mode of obtaining a fair expression of the people on the subject, was by sending the election back again to the people; because it was evident from the number of votes which Messrs. Prentiss and Word had received, that the decision of the House had had an influence on the election.

Mr. BELL made a brief explanation in relation to a reference which he had made on Saturday last to a gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. CAMPBELL addressed the House briefly, in explanation of the votes he had given on this subject heretofore, and announced his intention now to vote to send the whole subject back to the people.

Mr. PARKER addressed the House briefly, in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland to send back the whole matter to the people of Mississippi. When Mr. P. concluded,

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved a call of the House, and upon this motion asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were, yeas 196, nays 5.

So the House determined that there should be a call of the House.

The roll being called through by the Clerk, the doors were closed, the absentees called, and excuse rendered for all except four members.

Mr. HAYNES moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms request the attendance of those members, for whom no excuses had been offered, which was agreed to.

Mr. CLOWNEY moved to suspend all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. GRAVES called for the yeas and nays—

Mr. CLOWNEY then withdrew his motion to suspend.

Mr. REED moved to dispense with all further proceedings.

Mr. FOSTER called for the yeas and nays on this question.

Mr. REED then withdrew the motion.

The CHAIR then announced that as all the members were present who were not excused, all further proceedings under the call expired.

Mr. CLOWNEY then addressed the House briefly, contending that the election of July was void, and that the election of November was constitutional and legal. Therefore, he must vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, and in favor of admitting the claimants to seats on this floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. RICE GARLAND then moved an amendment, proposing to strike out all after the word "that," and insert a preamble which he sent to the CHAIR, setting forth that an election was held in November, and that Messrs. Prentiss and Word were elected members to the 25th Congress, and that they were entitled to seats on this floor.

After some few remarks by Messrs. PICKENS, ADAMS, LEGARE, WISE, ROBERTSON, and McKAY,

Mr. GARLAND withdrew his amendment.

Mr. CUSHMAN then called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, which were ordered.

After a few remarks by Messrs. EWING and ADAMS,

The question was taken on Mr. HOWARD'S amendment, declaring "that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are not entitled to seats in this House, as members of the 25th Congress," and decided—yeas 117, nays 117, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Bruyn, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Timothy J. Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cilley, John C. Clark, Jesse F. Cleveland, Walter Coles, Henry W. White, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—117.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, William B. Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clowney, Coffin, Thomas Corwin, Robert B. Cranston, John W. Crockett, Edward Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Halstead, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, R. M. T. Hunter, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Lawler, Lewis, Lincoln, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Mathias Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Patton, Pearce, Peck, Phillips, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Rumsey, Russell, Sawyer, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Yorke—117.

The CHAIR voted in the affimative, so the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD then moved the amendment he had before submitted, directing the Speaker to inform the Governor of the decision of the House.

Mr. WISE rose, and pronounced the decision of the House as unprecedented, and declared that if he was the Governor of Mississippi, he would not obey the mandate of this House, and if he was one of the gentlemen who had been elected in November last, he would present himself to the CHAIR, and demand to be qualified.

Mr. BOON rose and said that it had not until very recently been his intention to do or say more, in the settlement of the question then pending before the House, than to give his silent vote. But, said Mr. B. when I see gentlemen rise in their places upon this floor, and hear them declare, in a tone of arrogant self-confidence, that all those who may differ with them in opinion are mere tramplers under foot of the Constitution and the rights of the people, I feel myself called upon to express my utter contempt of him who would attempt to dictate to others. Sir, I never will consent for any man, with or without a beard, to dictate to me what is the true meaning of the Constitution and laws of the land. Happily for the people of this land of liberty, they are blessed with a Constitution which permits every individual who shall take an oath to its support, to construe it in a manner that will give peace and quiet to his own conscience and constitution, and to suit his or their own party purposes. Sir, why insult the intelligence of the American people by exclaiming against the influence of party here, when almost every vote taken in this House is so highly seasoned with party?

Mr. B. said that he was pleased to hear the honorable member from Tennessee (Mr. BELL) come out so honestly as he did on Saturday last, in his five minutes' speech, which consumed the greater part of two hours in delivering it. That gentleman freely admitted the influence of party feeling; and never, Mr. Speaker, was there a stronger appeal made to party feelings than was made by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee. When this question shall be settled by yeas and nays, then will the people of this country see whether the Constitution, or the monster party, has had most to do in the settlement of this question. And the people will see, too, whether or no there be any member of this House who shall not have represented the feelings of those who sent him here. Sir, this House, at the called session, solemnly adjudicated this question; and with all the material facts in the case being then discussed and fully considered, it was declared, by a majority of this House, that Messrs. CLAIBORNE and GHOLSON were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, and as such were admitted to seats on this floor. Now, sir, should this House reverse its own solemn decision thus pronounced, what confidence can then be placed by the American people in the decisions made by this House? I answer, none, sir; none whatever.

Sir, the question which this House has just passed upon, is a question deeply involving party principles; and I am gratified that the question has been decided in accordance with my views and feelings.

Mr. PRENTISS, one of the contestants, then addressed the House at some length, protesting against the decision of the House, so far as it was made, depriving the people of Mississippi of a representation on this floor, replying to remarks of gentlemen made on former occasions, and declaring that, if he was spared life till the next session of Congress, and he saw any prospect of then having justice done the people of Mississippi, he would again present himself, and see if he could not have this unconstitutional resolution rescinded, as the one was which was adopted in September last.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the House adjourn: lost.

Mr. HOWARD'S amendment was then agreed to.

The question then recurred on the resolution as amended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for a division of the question, so as to take the vote on the first part, rescinding the resolution of September last; and on this part of the resolution he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 121, nays 113.

So the first branch of the resolution was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the second branch of the resolution, declaring "that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are not entitled to seats in this House, as members of the 25th Congress," and decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 116.

The question was then taken on the third branch of the resolution, directing the Speaker to inform the Governor of Mississippi of the decision of the House, which was decided in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 88.

Mr. RHETT asked leave to present a resolution directing the Clerk to pay Messrs. Prentiss and Word the same per diem and mileage which members of Congress receive.

Objection being made,

On motion of Mr. OWENS,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 5, 1838.

The CHAIR announced a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a statement from the First Comptroller, in answer to the resolution of the 19th ultimo, requiring a list of articles of imported merchandise on which duties are assessed, with the rate of duty on each, together with a list of all articles that are imported duty free; which,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR also communicated a report from the Navy Department, containing a statement of the contracts made by the Commissioners of the Navy for the year 1837: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKEAN presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for, and use their best exertions to obtain, the passage of a law authorizing the construction of a Macadamized road from the National road, at some suitable point west of the western base of the Laurel Hill, by way of the United States arsenal near Pittsburg and the State arsenal at Meadville, to the harbor of Erie, and appropriating a sufficient sum of money out of the Treasury of the United States for its immediate commencement and speedy completion: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McK. also presented the memorial of J. G. Palmer and others, and the memorial of Justus Davis and others, of Wyalusing, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying Congress promptly to reject all propositions for the annexation of Texas to the Union, come from what source they may: laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the petition of Joseph Home, praying for the payment of certain bounties: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill providing for the occupation of the Columbia or Oregon Territory.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented two petitions from sundry citizens residing in New York and Vermont, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union: laid on the table.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the petition of Robert Wilmer: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WALKER introduced three petitions; one from the citizens of the Choctaw purchase of Mississippi; one from the citizens of Kemper county, Mississippi; one from the citizens of Kane county, State of Illinois; all praying the passage of a preemption law; and upon Mr. W's motion, these petitions were ordered to be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. MORRIS presented a petition from sundry citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union: laid on the table.

Mr. MORRIS also presented four petitions from citizens of the county of Richland, Ohio, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. The question as to receiving these petitions was laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER submitted a resolution directing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the propriety of relinquishing the duties on certain chain cables, imported into the United States by John E. May.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented eight memorials, numerously signed by citizens of Pittsburg, calling the attention of Congress to the justice and necessity of establishing a marine hospital at that place. The memorialists set forth, that from the geographical position and extensive commerce of their city, they were fully justified in indulging the hope that their city would be selected as a site for one of the six hospitals, contemplated by the act of the 3d March, 1837; but to their surprise, and the grievous disappointment and astonishment of the thousands of navigators who throng their city, the medical board appointed under that act, explored the river as high as Steubenville, without giving Pittsburg an examination. They protest against the proceedings of the medical board, and after setting forth the many advantages which recommend Pittsburg to the favorable consideration of Congress, pray the enactment of a law to establish a hospital of the first class for western boatsmen at the city of Pittsburg: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NORVELL presented two memorials from sundry citizens of Michigan, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of New Buffalo, and to build a light-house: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of the Baltimore and Susquehanna railroad company, praying that certain duties paid by them on railroad iron be refunded: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of the trustees of McDonough College, Illinois, praying for a grant of lands in aid of the funds of that institution: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. Y. also presented the petition of sundry citizens of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a mail route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the petition of the widow of John Robertson, a soldier of the late war, praying the renewal of a bounty land warrant: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of William Wegton, late major in the service of the United States, during the war with Great Britain, praying for balance of pay and emoluments alleged to be due him: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the petition of John Lacy, praying to be indemnified for losses sustained by him, under a contract with the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petitions of John Norwood and William Brier, praying indemnity for French spoliations prior to the year 1800; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of the representatives of Captain Nathaniel Goodwin; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of the heirs of Captain John McCarty; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the Senate with the surveys of plans and estimates for the improvement of the mouths of the Milwaukie, the Root, the Manitowac, the Sheboyagan, and the Kewaunee rivers, and the Havre bay.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred a resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of granting certain lands to the Territory of Wisconsin, for the establishment of a University, reported a bill granting two townships of land for that purpose.

Mr. WALKER, in pursuance of notice, introduced, upon leave, a bill authorizing the State of Mississippi to invest the two per cent fund.

Mr. LYON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of the heirs of John Campbell, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN, on leave, introduced a bill to cede the public lands within the strict limits of the new States, on certain conditions; which was twice read and referred.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Commerce, reported without amendment the bill from the House for the relief of Thomas Griffin.

Mr. YOUNG, in pursuance of previous notice, and on leave, introduced the following bills, which were severally twice read and referred:

A bill for the relief of James H. Ralston;

A bill for the relief of Alfred Westfall; and

A bill for the relief of Jacob Hanks.

The report from the Committee on Claims, unfavorable to the petition of John Good, was considered and concurred in.

The resolution submitted by Mr. WILLIAMS on Friday, calling on the President to communicate, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of the correspondence which has taken place between the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, and the State of Maine, on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, was considered and agreed to.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which the subject was referred by resolution of the Senate, reported a bill to establish a port of entry at Jersey City; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution to provide for the purchase and distribution of certain books for the use of the committee rooms; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Bulow, deceased, which was laid on the table on Friday last, was then taken up, the question being on its passage, when

Mr. KING opposed it, on the ground that it would be inexpedient to legislate upon an isolated case, before the proper and authentic report had been made by the regularly authorized agents of the Government. He would go as far as any man to do what was just in the matter, and to afford such relief as might be done consistent with what was due to other interests; but until such report was made, he could not feel himself authorized to vote for that or any other bill of a like character. There might be cases of great individual hardship, and this probably was; but admit the fact: he still thought it better that an individual case should be delayed for a short period, than we should run the risk, by a too hasty legislation, of involving the country in a vast amount of cost, such as, in fact, would be incalculable. Mr. K. denied that the principles recognised in civilized warfare, applied to savage warfare, where there almost always was one wide destruction of life and property; and that in Florida, so far from the United States troops having had possession of the estates leading to their destruction, it was a well known fact that in most cases they were invited to do so for the purpose of protection.

Mr. HUBBARD advocated the claim with much zeal, declaring it to come clearly within the principle recognised by the law of 1816, but that the bill before them only asked to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to take such evidence as would satisfy him that the claim was just, and came within the principle recognised in 1816; that was all the bill asked for.

Mr. NILES thought it better to proceed with great caution; the passage of the bill might involve the country to an immense amount of money. Mr. N. did not know whether savages had any code by which they recognised the laws of civilized people in their mode of warfare. He was inclined, however, to think it was distinct in principle. In civilized warfare private property was respected, unless in the occupancy of troops or used for martial purposes; then, in fact, the shield which the custom of civilized nations threw over it was removed; and when it fell into the hands of an enemy, it was destroyed in consequence of that possession. Did the same principle pertain among savages? He was inclined to think not. Their usual mode appeared to him to be indiscriminate slaughter and indiscriminate destruction of property, private as well as public. In this case, it was incumbent to show that this property was destroyed in consequence of such occupation. He thought the present case did not come within the principle claimed for it by the Senator from New Hampshire. The proof, he maintained, ought to be irresistible before any action was had on an isolated case, involving so many important items for consideration. After the report was made by the Government commissioners, some principle might then be settled on which Congress could act understandingly on the subject.

Mr. TIPTON said he could show cases of a like character with that before the Senate, that had occurred in the Northwestern Territory, where the parties injured had never thought of asking for remuneration. He would therefore move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD expressed some surprise at the remarks of the gentleman, (Mr. TIPTON,) as he was on the committee when the bill was unanimously reported, and no objections made.

Mr. TIPTON said he had never agreed to the features of the bill when in committee.

Mr. HUBBARD wished the motion withdrawn for a moment; but that not being acquiesced in, the motion to lay the bill on the table prevailed.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

The Independent Treasury bill was then taken up, the amendment of Mr. RIVES being under consideration.

Mr. RIVES said he indulged the hope that, after the failure of this measure in the other branch of the National Legislature, and the opinions so clearly manifested by the recent elections, that this subject would not again have been pressed upon the consideration of the Senate, but that the Committee on Finance would have presented some scheme upon which the great interests of the country might have harmonized. Mr. R. contended that this bill was a re-production of that of the last session, with additional deformity of feature, calculated to increase the patronage of the Executive to a far greater extent, and with the same tendency to create disorder and convulsion in the currency. Mr. R. spoke until near 4 o'clock, and gave way to a motion to adjourn, without having concluded his argument.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, February 6, 1838.

Mr. CARTER of Tennessee, asked leave of the House to correct an error, which appeared in the published list of the vote of last evening, on the Mississippi election, in the "Globe." He was represented as having voted in the affirmative for Mr. HOWARD'S amendment, but he voted in the negative, and it was so recorded on the Journal. Mr. C. asked the favor of the Globe reporters to make the correction. [The error occurred through inadvertency in transposing the names of Mr. CARTER of Maine, and Mr. CARTER of Tennessee.]

The SEEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in obedience to the requirements of the act of March 2, 1803, transmitting abstracts of the general returns of the militia of the United States, and of their arms, accoutrements and ammunition for the year 1837.

On motion of Mr. GRENNELL, laid on the table.

Reports from committees were then called for.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG reported a bill authorizing the purchase of certain books for distribution among the members of the House of Representatives, according to the resolution of the 27th of January, 1838.

Mr. C. explained, for the information of the House, the reason why the Committee of Ways and Means had reported this bill. It was not with them a matter of choice, but of necessity. A rule of the House expressly prohibited any amendment being engrafted on an appropriation bill, not previously authorized by law; and, therefore, neither the committee, nor the House itself, had any power to insert an item in the bill to meet the expenses under the resolution for the books. For this reason, the committee had directed him to report this bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of a communication from the War Department, in relation to the purchase of lands at Key West, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs: concurred in.

Mr. C. also moved the discharge of the same committee from the further consideration of a communication from the Treasury Department, in relation to extra compensation to the packers in the General Land Office, and the reference of the same to the Committee on the Public Lands: concurred in.

[The amendment was to the effect of excluding the Miami reservation from the operation of the bill.]

Mr. LINCOLN obtained leave to lay on the table, and have printed, an amendment he intended to submit when the bill came up for consideration.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BOULDIN reported a bill for the continuance for four years after the expiration of the present charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown.

JUDICIARY.

Mr. CORWIN reported Senate bill, with amendments, to change the times of holding the circuit courts of the United States in the seventh circuit.

The amendments were to add the "district," and to provide that the courts should be held at the seats of Government in Ohio, Michigan, and Indiana.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. TOUCEY made a report against the petition of Timothy Guard.

Mr. THOMAS made a report against the petition of Thomas Atkinson.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia reported a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Circuit Court of the United States held at Lewisburg, in the State of Virginia, and that the memorial against the abolishing that court, now lying on the table, be recommitted to that committee: concurred in.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. CRAIG made unfavorable reports on the petition of Isaac McCammant and John Snow.

Mr. MUHLENBERG made a report against the petitions of Gen. James Hogan and Jonas Bartlett.

Mr. PARMENTER reported a bill for the relief of Henry Hunt.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. HARLAN reported a bill to revive an act to enable claimants to land within the limits of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims, approved the 26th of May, 1824, and the act reviving the same, approved the 24th of May, 1828.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. MORGAN reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to allow compensation to pension agents.

Also, a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Jones and others.

Mr. BOND reported a bill for the relief of Asahel Kingsbury.

Mr. KLINGENSMITH reported a bill for the relief of Erastus Pierson.

Also, a bill for the relief of William Andrews of the State of New York.

ROADS AND CANALS.

When this committee was called,

Mr. GRANT asked leave to submit a motion to print 5000 extra copies of the report in relation to the construction of a ship canal round the falls of Niagara, but it was objected to.

SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. DUNCAN, from the select committee, on the memorial of Boyd Reily, reported a bill to purchase and use the apparatus invented and patented by Boyd Reilly, for applying gas or vapor to the human body in the naval and military service in the hospitals and in the penitentiaries of the United States.

LIBRARY.

Mr. PATTON moved that the joint Committee on the Library be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the House directing that committee to inquire into the expediency of purchasing the series of portraits of the first five Presidents of the United States, painted by the late Gilbert Stuart, for the purpose of having them preserved either in the Capitol or the Executive mansion, and that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. CUSHING said that he was aware, when he offered the resolution, that it did not strictly pertain to the jurisdiction of any one of the standing committees of the House. He had no objection to have the Committee on the Library discharged from its consideration, but hoped it would be referred to a select committee. It was contrary to his usual course in the House to make such a request; but he was induced to do it in this instance, from a conviction that on investigation it would be found that no more appropriate ornament could be placed in the Executive mansion than these admirable portraits of our early Presidents, from the pencil of so eminent an American artist.

The question being put, the Committee on the Library was discharged, and the subject was referred to a select committee.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BELL, on leave, submitted a resolution, providing that there be added to the standing rules and orders of the House, a rule that all the States and Territories shall be called for resolutions at least once a month during each session. Those giving rise to debate lying over as under the operation of the present rules,

Mr. MERCER was in favor of the resolution, but had doubts about its infrequency. He should prefer its operation to be made once a fortnight.

Mr. BELL had no objection to such a modification.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved to extend it to once a week.

Mr. BOON was understood to advocate twice a month.

Mr. REED was in favor of once a fortnight.

Mr. BELL thought that would, perhaps, meet the general sense of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS was willing to accept once a fortnight, if he failed in getting it once a week.

Mr. BELL thought it better to make it once a fortnight—say the second and fourth Tuesday in each month.

Mr. WILLIAMS'S amendment was then disagreed to without a division.

Mr. BELL then modified his resolution, by making the days for calling for resolutions the second and fourth Tuesdays in each, and varying the phraseology of the other parts accordingly.

Mr. HAYNES said it seemed to him that it would be better to make it every alternate petition day, Mondays. He suggested to the mover so to modify it.

Mr. BELL would be willing to do so if he thought it would be acceptable to the House, for he considered it a grievance that one out of the four public business days should be occupied in receiving petitions.

Mr. HAYNES. True, it was a grievance to some extent, but if they appropriated another day to resolutions, the grievance would be worse.

Mr. BELL suggested to the gentleman from Georgia to move such an amendment, and take the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. HAYNES accordingly moved so to amend the resolution.

Mr. BRONSON said, if he apprehended the effect of the amendment, it would be to prevent them from presenting petitions oftener than once a fortnight. This, he thought, would be restricting the right of petition rather too much; for even now, when one day in every week was open, not one petition in ten could be presented by those charged with them.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that, whatever disposition the House might make of this new rule, which he thought a very proper one, he hoped they would not entrench further upon the four days allowed to the business of the nation. They had amended the rules, upon a number of occasions, for the last ten years, until, at length, they had cut down the time for public business to four days only in each week, and the consequence was, that the session had been prolonged at least six weeks beyond what would otherwise have been necessary. He protested against taking one more day from the business of the country, for it would add another month to the session.

Mr HAYNES'S amendment was then agreed to, 84 to 53.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to, by a vote of two-thirds, and ordered to be added to the standing rules of the House, in the following words:

"All the States and Territories shall be called on each alternate Mondays for resolutions during each session of Congress, and, if necessary to secure this object on said days, all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion under the rules of the House already established; and the whole of said day shall be appropriated to resolutions until all the States and Territories are called through."

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

Mr. RHETT asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House pay to Messrs. Prentiss and Word the same compensation per diem and mileage that is allowed to members of Congress, computing the per diem from the day of presenting their claim to seats in this House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina objecting—

Mr. RHETT moved a suspension of the rule; which was agreed to—ayes 100, noes not counted.

And the question being on agreeing to the resolution—

Mr. CONNOR of North Carolina, and Mr. GRIFFIN of South Carolina, simultaneously rose and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. DAWSON, of Georgia, said that no gentleman in that House could be more willing than he that the gentlemen named in the resolution should, if it were proper, be allowed their expenses, as proposed; for he was one of those who believed that they were justly entitled to the seats which they had been denied on this floor, having been legally and constitutionally elected. But he also held that this House had an indisputable right to decide on the election and qualification of its own members; and the House had decided that Messrs. Prentiss and Word were not members of this body, or Representatives from the State of Mississippi. If not, what right could the House possess to allow them their per diem and travelling expenses? He could not see that such a measure was justified by the Constitution. The Constitution was not a mere premissive instrument; it spoke that it might command, and commanded that it might be obeyed. Mr. D. here read from the 6th section of the first article of the Constitution: "The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States." What was a Representative, in the sense of this passage? One who had been recognised as such by the House of Representatives. But these gentlemen had not been so recognised, were not therefore Representatives, and could not rightfully receive pay as such.

Mr. WISE observed that this was the resolution which the gentleman from South Carolina had attempted to offer yesterday, and which he had given notice that he should ask leave to offer this day. Mr. W. was proud and happy in being authorized by Mr. Prentiss to say, in behalf of himself and his colleague, to this House and to the people of Mississippi, that the claims of the people of Mississippi having been refused by that House, and her just and constitutional representation denied to her, he could not consent to have his own personal claims either recognised or refused as distinct from hers; and he therefore declared, proudly, that he would not touch a dollar of his pay until the rights of the State of Mississippi should be recognised. Mr. W. said, however, that, notwithstanding this honorable disclaimer on the part of that gentleman, he should still vote to allow the pay. And why? Because, according to Mr. W's view of the case, that gentleman was, according to both the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Mississippi, at that moment, in every thing save the oath of office, as much a member of that House as Mr. W. was. If he believed otherwise he never would vote for this resolution. On that point he entirely agreed with the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. DAWSON;) but, under his own views of the case, he should vote the pay. The gentleman from Mississippi might accept of it, or not, as he pleased. He repeated, however, that gentleman's own declaration, that he was too prond to touch the pay without discharging the duties of a member.

Mr. ADAMS wished to understand from the gentleman from Georgia how it was that he considered the principles he had laid down as applicable to Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE, and not to Messrs. Prentiss and Word?

Mr. DAWSON explained, (though in so low a voice as scarce to be heard by the reporter.) He was understood to say that Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE had been sworn, and had been pronounced by a vote of the House duly elected; and as he held the House to have the sole right of judging respecting the election and qualification of its own members, he felt bound to submit to its decision, and therefore to recognise Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE entitled to their pay, while the other gentlemen were not, being, in both respects, in precisely opposite circumstances.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not understand the force of this distinction. Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE were sworn, under a decision of the House, declaring them duly elected, which decision has since been pronounced unconstitutional, null, and void, and has been rescinded as such. On what ground, then, is it, that they are to be considered as entitled to their compensation and indemnity, while the same is to be withheld from those who come here with real credentials, which they produce, and which are duly authenticated by the Governor and the broad seal of the State, but who were denied their seats in the House by a majority of one? On what principle this distinction can be made, I confess I am not able to comprehend. The substance of the argument sets a decision of this House over both the Constitution and laws of the land; and that is precisely the ground on which I hold, and always have held, the resolution of this House of the 3d of October, as null and void, and in which I hold the resolution adopted last night to be equally so. They are both utterly unconstitutional, null, and void, and are in no wise binding on the people of Mississippi, or of any other portion of the U. States.

It is not by virtue of any express law that gentlemen taking their seats here are entitled to compensation and indemnity. The gentleman from Georgia does not contend that there is any necessity, under law, to pay them as if they had been duly elected; and yet, though there is no law for that, he thinks it is proper to allow those who, as he admits, were not duly elected, their pay and mileage, while he holds it not proper to allow it to those who were duly elected, and why? Because the one set of gentlemen were recognised by a vote afterwards rescinded, and the other set were rejected by a majority of one vote.

Mr. WISE. Of half a vote. (A laugh.)

Mr. A. I have no disposition to contest the right of Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE to represent the people of Mississippi for the whole of the Twenty-fifth Congress, when not one of the people of Mississippi voted for them with any such intention. Nor do I object to their receiving their pay. I desire not to be understood as objecting, in the slightest manner, to their receiving their full pay to the last cent. But I call upon this House (if I am to call in vain upon the gentleman from Georgia) to point out the distinction on which these individuals shall receive it, and the others not, who, I say, are as legally the representatives in this House of the State of Mississippi, as I am a representative of the State of Massachusetts, with this simple difference, that I was admitted without the production or exhibition of any credentials at all, and these gentlemen did produce and exhibit full credentials, in due and authentic form. The gentleman, it is plain, rests on the decision of this House: that is, upon the election, by this House, of persons to represent the people of Mississippi; and I understand the gentleman, (though he did not now say so in express words,) from the tenor of his argument when this question was under discussion before, that the House, being the judge of the election qualification and returns of its own members, possesses an unlimited, unqualified, unbounded power to admit whom it pleases within these walls, whether elected by the people of a State or not.

[The CHAIR here interposed, and reminded Mr. ADAMS that the question having been decided yesterday, was not now open to debate, and that it would not be in order to answer, now, arguments which were urged then.]

Mr. A. resumed. Suppose, then, that the gentleman from Georgia has given as his reason for opposing this resolution that the House has power to decide as it pleases, and having decided for Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE, they are entitled to their pay, while those who were duly elected, but excluded by the House, are not entitled. I suppose that he holds that until the decision of the 3d of October was rescinded, it was binding on every man, woman and child in Mississippi and in the United States. I hold the reverse.

[Here the CHAIR again interposed, and reminded Mr. A. as before, that this question was not now open to argument.]

Mr. A. Well, I will endeavor to keep within the pale of order as well as I can. I ask, why are not Messrs. Prentiss and Word entitled to their pay? The gentleman from Georgia says because by a decision of the House they have not been received as members, while the others have.

Mr. DAWSON here again explained. Under the Constitution members alone were to receive compensation: the House had declared Messrs. PRENTISS and WORD not to be members, and therefore he could not vote to pay them.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, I still understand that he adheres to the decision of this House, admitting Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE, as the reason why they are entitled to their pay; although that resolution was rescinded, and the House has declared that GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE are not, and of course never were, members of this House. Now, I say, that if the resolution of the 3d of October, declaring them members, was a nullity, it was a nullity so far as to destroy their claim to pay. I look for an equitable distinction (there can be none other) between the cases; an equitable reason why one should get the pay and the other not.

As to whether the gentlemen from Mississippi will receive the money, or not, that is not a question for this House; it is no question for my consideration; that is their own affair. What I have to consider is, whether these gentlemen are entitled to receive it, after they have come up here, sent by the people of Mississippi, under every provision of the Constitution and of the laws, and this House has refused to admit them? It would surely be the most extraordinary thing in the world, if compensation for their expenses and time, in fulfilling the will of the people of their State, shall be refused them, while it is allowed to those whom this House has pronounced not to be the Representatives of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. BOULDIN said he should vote to pay both parties. Whose rights, he asked, were in controversy? The rights of the people of the United States, and especially of the State of Mississippi. At whose expense was this question to be contested? Surely at the expense of the people. If the question was of so doubtful a complexion that it was decided but by a majority of one vote, and the people were contending for their rights, (they asked no more) the expense of testing those rights ought to be paid for at the expense of the contenders, namely, the people. Through whom could they contend, if not through the candidates for seats here? But if these candidates were to be saddled with their own expenses, who would be found willing to run the risk? Some gentlemen had asked, was the House to pay the expenses of any persons that chose to come here, and claim a seat? Certainly not. But here was a case where the claims were so fair on both sides, and so evenly balanced, that the matter was decided by a bare majority of one, (or, as his colleague said, half a one.) As to the pride of the gentlemen from Mississippi, Mr. B. trusted in God that none of the parties would have any pride about the matter, save in contending for the rights of the people of Mississippi. But, pride or no pride, he hoped they would be paid. One set of claimants certainly had the form, but it was just as clear to him that the other set had the substance. His vote had gone for the substance. But he would never vote to compel them to pay their own expenses.

Mr. WISE here offered an amendment providing that Congress should pay the people of Mississippi the expenses of an election which had been caused by the error of that House.

He then, to prevent misunderstanding, and obviate the idea that he meant to be ill-natured to the Speaker, explained what he had meant by saying that the question last night had been decided by "half a vote." He had alluded, not to the Speaker, but to the Representative from Arkansas, (Mr YELL,) whose claim to a seat stood on precisely the same ground with that of these claimants. It was a striking fact that the vote had been brought to a tie by the vote of the member from Arkansas, who, in the very act of trying the question of Prentiss and Word, disqualified himself. He took one step on land and the very next into the water: his own vote went to exclude himself; and yet it was that vote which made the tie, and enabled the Speaker to give the casting vote. Deduct this vote, and Messrs. Prentiss and Word were entitled to their seats at this moment. Mr. W. did not impugn the right of the gentleman from Arkansas, or mean in the least to reflect upon him. According to that gentleman's explanation of the matter, he had a right to his seat; but according to the principle of the decision of the House, he had not, and ought now to be wending his way back to Arkansas, in company with Messrs. Prentiss and Word.

Mr. W. said the House was taking advantage of its own wrong if it rejected the resolution. And as to the amendment, certainly the State of Mississippi had had enough in paying for two elections already; as the House had now forced her into a third, the House ought to pay her for it.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment was a distinct and substantive proposition, and did not adhere to the resolution; it was therefore, as an amendment, out of order.

Mr WISE said he should not insist. He had supposed it to be in pari materi, a part of the res gestæ of this remarkable affair.

Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia, alluding to the amount of time already consumed by the debate, moved the previous question.

The motion was sustained by the House—ayes 71, noes 61.

The previous question was then put, and carried, and the question on the resolution decided by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 136, nays 41.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Speaker was requested to appoint a member of that committee, vice Mr. CLAIBORNE.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The orders of the day being announced, Mr. EVANS said there was an Executive communication on the table, relative to the Northeastern boundary, and the arrest and imprisonment of a citizen of Maine by the British authorities, which had been postponed some days ago, and had not yet been acted upon. He would not, at so late an hour of the day, ask for its consideration, but gave notice that to-morrow, at 1 o'clock, when it would be in order, and would have precedence in the orders of the day, he should move for its consideration.

WESTERN TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CUSHING moved to take up and refer an Executive message, on the table of the House, giving information concerning the extreme western territory of the United States. Mr. C. said that Great Britain was, at the present moment, pursuing, or at least permitting, a series of gross encroachments on that part of the territory of the United States; encroachments flagrant, palpable, monstrous, which it was time the whole nation should understand.

The message was accordingly taken up, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOWARD in the Chair, and, on motion of Mr. C. took up and considered the "bill making appropriations for the Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1838."

Mr. CAMBRELENG made a brief explanation of the reason of the increase of $500,000 in this bill over that last year, owing to the addition of 1,300 hundred new pensioners. After being amended in in one of its provisions, it was laid aside to be reported.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then took up the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1838," and the same having been read through by the Clerk, was taken up by sections.

On motion of Mr. SHEPPERD, the following item was stricken out.

For the discharge of such miscellaneous claims against the United States, not otherwise provided for, as shall be admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury, twelve thousand dollars.

When the appropriations for the salaries of certain foreign ministers were read,

Mr. EVERETT said the bill contained no appropriation for the salary of a minister to Mexico. He asked whether the appropriation of $18,000 of the last session for that mission remained unexpended; if expended, we should wish an appropriation made now.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied that the appropriation was unexpended, and would be applicable to the object for two years.

When the clause in relation to the salaries of public ministers was read,

Mr. JENIFER wished to know if the appointments of ministers to Prussia and Austria had been filled up, or if it was in contemplation to do so, because, if not, it would be needless to make the appropriation.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had been informed, though he knew nothing certain about it, that such appointments were, or one of them was, in contemplation.

After some further conversation in relation to some of the other items of the bill, the committee rose and reported the first bill to the House; when,

On motion of Mr. HOWARD,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 6, 1838.

TENNESSEE RESOLUTIONS OF INSTRUCTION.

Mr. GRUNDY rose and remarked, that he had risen to present to the Senate a preamble and resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee. By one of these resolutions, the Senators are positively instructed, and the representatives in Congress from the State are requested, "to vote against any law which may propose to enforce the Sub-Treasury system of finance recommended by the President of the United States in his Message to Congress of the 4th day of September last."

Mr. G. considered the bill reported by the Finance Committee, and now under discussion in this body, as embraced by this resolution; and, believing, as he had always done, and still did, in the right of instruction by State Legislatures to their Senators in Congress, he felt no difficulty in declaring he should comply with the instructions in good faith, by voting against the bill in all its stages. As to questions which may arise in the progress of the bill, he should, without advising with or consulting any one, give such votes as in his judgment ought to be given by a fair and honorable opponent of the measure.

Mr. G. further remarked, that he should lose no time in informing the members of the General Assembly of Tennessee of the course of conduct adopted by him on this subject.

He then moved that the preamble and resolutions should be read, laid upon the table, and printed.

The resolutions were then read; after which they were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Secretary of War, transmitting an abstract of the general returns of the militia of the United States, together with a statement of their arms, equipments and munitions of War: referred to the Committee on the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR also communicated a report from the War Department, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in answer to the resolution of the 11th ult. in relation to the Indian boundary, referred to in the act authorizing the people of Missouri to form a State Government; which,

On motion of Mr. LINN, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of Richard B. Mason, praying indemnity for the non-performance of a contract with him by the Commissioners: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MERRICK also presented the petition of R. C. Hardesty, postmaster at ——, Anne Arundel county, Md. praying to be compensated for extra services: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. McKEAN presented memorials from sundry citizens of Pittsburg, praying for the establishment of a marine hospital at that place; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented four memorials from the citizens of Pittsburg, of the same character, which were similarly referred.

Mr. KING presented the joint memorial of the two Houses of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, asking Congress to pass a pre-emption law; a law graduating the price of the public lands; a law authorizing the relinquishment of the 16th section of land granted for the use of schools, where they may be unproductive, and the location of other lands in lieu thereof; and a law to cede he refuse lands to the States in which they lie: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to move that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the resolution of the Senate, calling for information respecting the amount of the public moneys in the Commonwealth Bank, at Boston, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

In this report, said Mr. WEBSTER, the Secretary says that no instructions were ever given by the Treasury Department to tender bank notes of any denomination to public creditors or officers; and he says, at the same time, that it was impracticable to pay all the public creditors, especially on the seaboard, in specie, as sufficient could not be collected. The law, therefore, has been plainly one way, and the practice the other. The act of Congress says no bills not equivalent to specie shall be offered in payment; and I commend this report to the particular and careful perusal of those who suppose they can maintain a specie currency for Government, while they suffer the general paper currency of the country to be depreciated. In my opinion, the state of things detailed in this report is a correct sample, or a foretaste of what we shall experience, on a large scale, when the Sub-Treasury bill shall have become law, and a nominal specie currency, for revenue purposes, shall have been established. Although the law now existing is precise and positive, that Government officers shall pay all public creditors in specie, or bills equivalent to specie, and shall offer them nothing else, yet the Secretary says that it has been impracticable to obtain specie for this purpose either of the banks or the merchants; and this he says at a time when there is supposed to be a large quantity of specie in the country. Here, then, is exactly such a state of things as we propose to establish by Sub-Treasuries and an exclusive specie currency. We see here precisely how the system will work. While there are banks (and banks there will be) the specie will inevitably get into the banks; and whenever any disaster happens to the banks, so that they suspend specie payments, neither the Government nor the merchants can get the specie out. Dues to Government, therefore, will not be received in specie, and dues from Government will not be paid in specie. On the other hand, if the banks maintain their credit, and redeem their notes in specie on demand, an exclusive specie currency will be useless and unnecessary. The result of all will be, that an exclusive specie currency will be always either unnecessary or impracticable. It will be a superfluity or an impossibility.

The following sums of public money appear, by the Secretary's report, to be now in deposite in that bank:

1st. The sum standing to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States -	$39,639
2d. Sum reported as standing to the credit of the collector - - -	65,941
3d. Amounts to the credit of the late pension agency - - - -	154,848
4th. Amount standing to the credit of the commissioners for building the custom-house - - - -	70,000
5th. Amount to the credit of Major Craig, Ordnance Department - -	1,119
6th. Amount to credit of the Post Office Department - - - -	7,644
7th. Amount to the credit of the Paymaster General - - -	346
Making a total of - -	$339,537

The Secretary represents these deposites to have been made, generally, before the suspension of specie payments; but that $150,000 was received by the bank in October and December last, on drafts which had been issued by the Treasury in favor of the bank before the suspension. No money has been directed to be deposited in the bank since the suspension. It is not stated what security exists for the payment of this large sum, or what is the chance of its payment.

As to the manner in which the bank paid pensions and bounties, I find attached to the report a letter from the President of the bank, in which he says, that "in all cases were the bills of this bank, or any other bank, have been paid by this bank to pensioners, or their attorneys, they were voluntarily received by them!" The nature of these voluntary receipts of payments, in depreciated paper, has been sufficiently shown by the letter and the affidavit which I have laid before the Senate. The affidavit seems not to be deficient in facts.

The statement is—

I, Asa Pickering, of Bellingham, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, residing at present in Boston, as a member of the Legislature, on oath do declare and say: That, on the third day of October now last past, I called at the office of the Pension Agent in the city of Boston, to receive a pension due to my father, Benjamin Pickering, for Revolutionary services. He already had on hand a quantity of the bills of the Commonwealth Bank, and instructed me to procure other money, if possible. I called, and was requested to step into a room to make the necessary affidavit, for which I was charged, and paid in specie, twenty-five cents. I then received a check for sixty-three dollars, and was directed to present the check at the opposite counter. I did so, and had tendered to me a fifty dollar bill of the Commonwealth Bank; also a ten and a three dollar bill of the same bank. I declined receiving them, and stated that I wanted something better. I told them at least I wanted a little specie. I should like the thirteen dollars in specie. They told me I must take that or nothing. I asked them for the ten or the three in specie: both were refused. I then asked at least for the twenty-five cents in specie which I had just paid, and it was refused. I then read one of their bills to them, and asked if they would pay old Revolutioners in nothing but lies. I was obliged to take their bills, contrary to my wishes and instructions.

ASA PICKERING.

This too, is a fair specimen of what will happen hereafter, when we shall have, nominally, a system of exclusive specie payments and receipts. Forty statutes could not forbid payments of bank notes more distinctly and peremptorily than the present law forbids all payments in depreciated bank notes. Yet, here it is admitted, both by the disbursing officers and by the Secretary himself, that such depreciated bank notes have been offered in payment and received; although the very offering of them, that is, the act of proposing to make payments in such notes, is in the teeth of the act of Congress. So it will be hereafter. The law will be positive that nothing but gold and silver shall be offered; yet paper will be offered, and often taken; and just such contests will arise as that which arises in this case; the Government officers insisting that the paper was voluntarily received, and the party receiving it, on the other hand, insisting, and making oath that he resisted the receipt of it as long as he could, and took it at last simply because he could get nothing else. I think any man must be short-sighted, who does not perceive that occurrences of this sort will be constantly happening under a system in which the Government uses, or pretends to use, one currency, and the people another.

But, sir, there is another important matter disclosed in this report, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate.

It is known that during the existence of the Bank of the United States, the United States pensions were paid by that bank, without cost or charge, and as the bank was a safe depository, no losses happened to Government or to individuals.

When the bank charter expired, Congress was called on to make some other provision for paying pensions, and the act of April 20, 1836, was passed. That act provides that, in future, payments of pensions shall be made by such persons or corporations, as the Secretary of War may direct, "but no compensation or allowance shall be made to such persons or corporations for making such payments, without authority of law."

This act was passed under that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress, by law, to vest the appointment of such inferior officer as they think proper, in the Heads of Departments.

Under this law the Secretary of War appointed these officers, and a list of them has been recently sent by him to the Senate. It will appear from the report from the War Department that, like other disbursing officers, they have been called on to give official bonds; and there is no manner of doubt that, to all intents and purposes, they are officers under the Government of the United States.

But now to their pay. The act of April 20, 1836, creating the office and providing for the appointment of the officer, declares, as I have already said, that no allowance or compensation shall be made to them, without authority of law. Now Congress has passed no further law on the subject, and yet how stands the matter of their pay?

It will be remembered that, in 1834, the President, or Secretary of War, before the bank charter expired, undertook to transfer the pension funds from the Bank of the United States to the deposite banks; and on that occasion, those deposite banks were told, as will be seen by this report, that, in consideration of the benefits which they would derive from the deposites, no commission or salary would be allowed.

The same course was adopted after the act of 1836 passed; so that, from that time to the present, pension agents, appointed by the Secretary of War, get their pay by the use of the Government funds their hands. And I find, by inquiry at the proper source, that the general rule is, to advance the necessary funds six months before they will be needed; so that the agent has the use of the money for that period; and when the time comes for paying it to the pensioners, he pays it, and immediately receives from the Treasury an advance for the next six months. So that he has, the whole year round, the use of a sum of money equal to one-half the whole annual amount of pensions paid at his office.

For instance, the whole annual amount of pensions, paid at Boston, is three hundred and twenty thousand dollars, or thereabouts. One-half this sum is one hundred and sixty thousand dollars; and the agent, as his compensation for paying the pensions, actually enjoys the use of this sum the whole year.

Suppose the use of the money to be worth six per cent. per annum, the compensation thus made to the pension agent in Boston is more than nine thousand dollars.

So in New Hampshire, where there are two pension agencies, one at Portsmouth, and one at Concord. At the Portsmouth agency, thirty-three thousand dollars, or thereabouts, is annually paid out. The agent, therefore, has usually on hand the one-half of this sum, say fifteen thousand five hundred dollars, the interest of which would be near a thousand dollars.

At the Concord pension office, the amount of annual payments is sixty six thousand dollars. One-half of this sum being usually on hand, the agent receives, for discharging the duties of his office, the use of that one-half, say of thirty-three thousand dollars, which, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, amounts to nineteen hundred, or two thousand dollars. These sums are taken from official statements, and I believe are correct; and the other general facts obtained from authentic sources.

It will probably strike the Senate, in the first place, that these rates of compensation are exceedingly large, especially in these days of professed economy and reform; and, in the next place, all will admit that this mode of making compensation is the worst in the world, as it places the funds of the Government every day at hazard. How this mode of making compensation, or this amount of compensation, can be reconciled to the words of the act of Congress, which declare that there shall be no compensation without authority of law, I hope some gentleman will undertake to explain.

In most cases, but I believe not in all, the list will show these agents are presidents of State banks; but the appointments, nevertheless, are personal appointments, and the banks themselves are not responsible for the agent's fidelity. As I have already said, the agents, like other disbursing officers of Government, give bonds for the due discharge of the duties of their office. I trust, sir, that the Committee on Finance will see the necessity of some further legal provision on this subject.

Since I am speaking on this subject, I will (said Mr. W.) take leave to make a remark or two on a personal matter. The Globe of Saturday, still pursuing a course of meddling with the private concerns of public men, which course, nevertheless, it admits is exceedingly despicable, reiterates charges of my having had paper dishonored at this Commonwealth Bank. The obvious object of all this, as of the former article, it is evident, is to hold out an appearance that I owe the bank, or have owed it in times past. I think it very likely that, by the time this statement of the Globe gets a hundred miles from Washington, it will be so amplified as to represent me as an acknowledged debtor to the bank to a great amount; and, by the time it gets over the mountains, the failure of the bank will be mainly ascribed, very possibly, to its loans to me. I repeat, therefore, that I never owed the bank a dollar, so far as I remember, nor ever had any pecuniary transaction with it whatever.

The statement is, that a bill drawn by me, and accepted was sent to the bank for collection, and not duly paid by the acceptor. It was, of course returned upon the drawer, and duly paid and taken up by him. All this is very unimportant and innocent; but it is stated as if with studious design, to represent me as a debtor to the bank; whereas, in the first place, the bank had no interest in it whatever; and, in the second place, it was duly paid by the drawer on the acceptor's neglect. As to any acceptance of my own, sent to that bank for collection, being protested, I never heard of it, to my knowledge. If such a thing happened, it must have been accidental, and owing to some mistake as to the day, which was seasonably corrected. Nor can it be true that any note or bill with my name on it was handed over to another bank on the failure of this Commonwealth Bank, unless it was some dead note or bill which had been already paid to those who were entitled to receive payment. This apparent and obvious purpose of representing me, as a debtor to the bank, or as ever having been a borrower at it, is founded in sheer misrepresentation and falsehood.

I perceive that the directors, or officers, of this bank have been busying themselves to help out the statements of the Globe; yet no one them says I ever owed the bank a dollar in the world; they might, I think, be better employed. It has been stated publicly that these officers have helped themselves to loans, from their own bank, to an amount exceeding the amount of all its capital, and then failed, bank and all, leaving a prodigious mass of unredeemed paper upon the hands of the public. I know not how this may be; but, until the charge is cleared up, one should think they might find better employment than in attempting to bolster up slanderous imputations against their neighbors, and attacking people who have not the misfortune to owe them any thing.

Mr. NILES said he had no intention to interfere in the personal contention between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Editor of the Globe. He thought they were very well matched, and both quite competent to take care of themselves. He would only add, that he was glad to hear that the gentleman had paid his protested drafts, and that the Commonwealth Bank, which appeared to be in a bad way, had sustained no loss from that quarter. His object in rising was to say that he believed the gentleman was mistaken, if he asserted, as he (Mr. N.) understood him to do, that the pension agent at Boston had personally received the benefit of the use of the funds which had been advanced for the payment of pensions, some months previous to the period when they were required for disbursement. He (Mr. N.) had some knowledge on this subject, having been once a director in a deposite bank, the president of which was a pension agent. The practice was to appoint the presidents of deposite banks agents; but the bank itself was considered as the real agent, and the use of the funds went to compensate the bank for its expenses in performing the pension agency. The president was not personally benefited by the funds, or, at least, that was the case of the president of the deposite bank in his own State, and to which he had referred; and he presumed the practice had been uniform, as the directors of that bank applied to the Secretary of the Treasury to have a different person appointed, which the Secretary declined, saying that he considered the bank as the real agent; that he regarded the president as acting for the bank, and that he could not appoint any other person. Although the law did not expressly require his appointment, yet such had been the practice. Mr. N. believed, therefore, that the Senator was entirely mistaken in supposing that the pension agent had pocketed the benefits of the use of the funds remitted to pay pensions.

In regard to the advancement of pension funds some months before they were to be disbursed, it was done as a compensation to the bank for its services and the expenses of the pension agent, where it had not other funds in deposite sufficient for that purpose. The bank could not afford to hire one or two clerks to perform the service for nothing; the law contemplated that the bank was to be remunerated by the use of the public moneys. The bank to which he had referred, in his own State, incurred an expense of something like fifteen hundred dollars a year, and its receipts from the public revenue were merely nominal; and if moneys to be disbursed were not remitted until they were to be paid out, it would have increased this expenditure, without any remuneration, directly or indirectly. He believed that the law never contemplated this; neither did he believe that there was any loss to the Treasury, so far as respects the use of the funds, as they may as well be in one deposite bank as in another, as the Government received nothing for them, or not previous to the act of 1836, and under that only, in certain contingencies, the allowance of two per cent.

If the Treasury has sustained any loss from this practice, it was the result of the deposite system, which rested on a false and dangerous principle. He thanked the Senator for bringing this matter before the Senate, as it presented a strong case to illustrate the dangerous and corrupting tendencies of the deposite system. That system was based on the principle of paying for public services by the use of the public revenues, and a more pernicious principle could not be conceived. Whether the public funds are deposited in a National bank, or State banks, the principle is the same. He hoped the system would be abandoned, and for ever, and that we should return to the early, simple, and honest practices of the Government. Let us take care of our own funds, and pay our public agents for their services. If the Treasury has sustained any loss in the cases referred to by the Senator, it has resulted from this preposterous system of throwing our funds into the hands of corporations, not to be kept, but to be used as a compensation for services performed for the Government. How can we complain of losses which are the legitimate fruits of a bad system? If we allow our moneys to be sported with, or used in speculation, and the gambling transactions of individuals, can we with any justice or propriety complain if they are squandered and wasted. As we are now about to settle the fiscal policy of the Government, he hoped that examples like these would not be without their influence on the minds of all who had a single eye to the safety af the public revenues, and the interest of the people.

Mr. WEBSTER replied, that the law provided, in so many terms, that these pension agents shall receive no compensation without provision by law. The Senator from Connecticut argued, therefore, that as it was necessary to make the laws, it was necessary for the head of the Department to supersede the laws. In the next place, the law provided that the Secretary might appoint such persons or such corporations as he pleased. But these appointments were always personal appointments, and the person appointed was an officer of the Government, and gave bond for the fulfilment of his duty, like any other officer, and as he (Mr. W.) understood it, the bank of which he was an officer was, in no way, responsible for his good conduct. It was a personal affair altogether. This matter had nothing to do with the deposite system. All he had to say was, that a pension agency was a particular appointment, under a particular law. The subject was for the attention of Congress, and no matter whether the compensation went to a bank or to an individual, it was too large. He only desired to call the attention of the Committee on Finance to the existing state of things, in order that they might apply the remedy.

Mr. NILES remarked, that he believed there was no law providing for the appointment of individuals as pension agents, which declared that they should perform that service without any compensation. If there was, it would certainly be a very extraordinary law. He believed the fact was, that the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, required that institution to perform the services of commissioners of loans, among other services, in consideration of receiving the deposites of the Government. When the deposites were removed from that bank and placed in State institutions, they were required to perform the same services, and for the like consideration. The act the gentleman has read, provides for the appointment of either individuals or corporations as pension agents, and he believed, that in practice, corporations only had been appointed.

Mr. WEBSTER said that the letter of the Comsioner, fixing the compensation which has been adopted as the basis of the arrangement, spoke for itself. Mr. W. then read the law of the 20th April, 1836, before referred to.

Mr. NILES rejoined that the law spoke of "persons or corporations." He was not aware that any other than corporations had been appointed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said this report was quite an anomaly. Of the public money $70,000 were gone in one sum by this bank; and Mr. C. observed that early in October, 1836, the Secretary of the Treasury had deposited $200,000 with the commissioner for building the new custom-house at Boston, and afterwards $50,000 more, making the sum of $250,000, and of this sum, when the bank failed, there were $70,000 remaining in it. If the Senator from Connecticut was so tenacious in maintaining the uprightness of Treasury management, perhaps he could furnish some excuse for this. Here a loss by a deposite and by a disbursing officer had been sustained, and the money had been two years in his hands. If the $200,000 only had been given, there would still have been a loss of $20,000; but while the hands of this agent were already overflowing with the public money, the Government in April gave him $50,000 more; and the period, it would be recollected, was a very critical one with the banks. Why take this large sum of money out of the Treasury, and put it on deposite in the hands of any public agent? It might be necessary to sustain the bank, but could not be necessary to sustain the officer. He was already flooded with money, which he could not expend, when the $50,000 were added. And there was a loss now by this bank of $70,000. If things were managed in this way, Mr. C. did not see occasion for a Sub-Treasury bank, or any bank at all. It seemed as if this required some remedy.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, at this rate, to borrow the language of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) we had very great occasion for a Sub-Treasury. He had watched the progress of the discussion on this Commonwealth Bank affair, and it appeared to him that if any arguments were wanting to prove the necessity of divorcing the Treasury from banks as fiscal agents, what they had heard in relation to the proceedings of this bank was conclusive. Audi alteram partem had always been a maxim with him, and therefore he would not at present pronounce any opinion with regard to the management of that institution, or to the conduct of the Treasury Department, in advancing to it deposits of public money to meet the present pensions. He was glad the motion had been made to refer the subject to the Committee on Finance, because, by this means, justice would be done to all parties. But as long as the late system of depositing the public funds continued, there would always be the same complaints that were now made. Place the power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit and withdraw the public funds as his discretion may dictate, and suspicion, jealousy, and distrust, will always follow his proceedings, whether they be right or wrong; and if any future Secretary should be dishonest—if he should desire to use the public money to elevate himself to the high places of the nation, the country could never be safe with such a power in his hands.

After all the clamor which had been raised against the Independent Treasury, it was only a simple measure to receive from the public debtors the amount they owe, to keep it safely in the custody of our own responsible officers, and to pay it out again to those to whom we are indebted, without the agency of such banks as that of the Commonwealth.

It had been said of this bank, that it had loaned out all its money to its own directors.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had heard this, but did not state it as of his own knowledge.

Mr. BUCHANAN continued. He feared that, on investigation, other banks would be found to have acted in a similar manner. If, said he, you want to save the public money for the use of the people, and prevent it from becoming the instrument of Executive influence, you must keep it yourselves, under the control of the law, until it is wanted for the public service.

He was sorry any thing had been said in the public newspapers that rendered it necessary, in the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, to defend himself on that floor. He thought it bad policy for a member of the Senate to come here and defend himself against newspaper attacks; for if he did, he would be almost certain to get the worst of the bargain. And whether a member was innocent or not, he thought it better for him to leave his defence to his friends out of doors. After all, no charge had been made against the Senator from Massachusetts, affecting either his honor or his integrity. We had nearly all, perhaps, been under protest at some period of our lives, by accident, or from inability to meet our pecuniary engagements on the very day they became due. Surely this was no crime.

With respect to the advances to the Commonwealth Bank, spoken of by the Senator from Massachusetts, he believed it would turn out to be nothing more than this: the Secretary of the Treasury, having the unlimited control over the funds of the Government, has thought it just to place a certain portion of them, in advance, on deposite, to meet the accruing demands of the pensioners. But the Secretary of the Treasury ought to have no such power; and he entirely concurred with the Senator from Massachusetts in the opinion that no emolument in the use of the public funds should be given to the pension agents, or any other agents under the Government. But this was the fault of the system, not of the Secretary. We should keep our money ourselves, and pay it out to the public creditors when due them; and then we should hear no such complaints.

Mr. CLAY said this incidental debate was a little unexpected by him; but as it has come up, said he, I will take the opportunity to say a few words. The Senator (Mr. BUCHANAN) says that these astounding disclosures, for so I regard them, afford satisfactory proof of the necessity of adopting the Sub-Treasury system, alias the Government Bank of the United States, which is now before the Senate. And what is it he tells us now of the favorite system which was adopted in 1834, and of which he was then and since the strenuous advocate? He says now it is dangerous, and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. NILES) says it is corrupting, and that it is not thought worthy of confidence. But why this discrepancy? Why, when the member and his friends had rejected a system and an institution which for near half a century had taken care of the public money without the loss of a single cent—why, when that faithful institution was discarded, did they resort to this, which he now calls unsafe and corrupting? Sir, having found that the system which they adopted three years ago has failed, they are now for giving us another of their prescriptions, which we must take from these same doctors, although their former prescription failed, which was the grand catholicon in 1834. And in three years more, they will call this new system, which they now want to force upon us, just as unsafe and corrupting as the former.

Sir, who are these Sub-Treasurers, and what satisfaction have we that they will be angels, pure, faithful, and always acting with fidelity and advantage to the finances of the country? If rumor does not misinform us, we are already in the way to lose millions in the hands of individuals. And will the same individuals do better under this new system? No, sir, under no system whatever; and some three years hence we shall find those who are now denouncing their own experiment, again denouncing this their other experiment. Sir, I ask, how can you expect that an individual should have half a million of the public money in his hands, without danger of his helping himself or his friends at the public expense? When this new experiment shall prove a failure, as fail it will, if we adopt it, we shall then have some other experiment to delude and deceive the credulity of the American people Give me no more of these Sub-Treasury schemes, no more of these experiments, these nostrums.

Sir, (said Mr. C.) when I entered the Senate this morning, my ears were delighted with a sound which came from a quarter quite unexpected. The Senator (Mr. GRUNDY) got up, with his instructions in his hand, and in a manly manner declared that he would conform to those instructions. Sir, I hope they will be conformed to by others in this Senate. Some of my friends do not hold that they are bound to obey such instructions; and they therefore acted with perfect consistency—declined to conform to them. I (said Mr. C.) am among the number who, with certain qualifications, do hold to the doctrine of instruction. Let those who hold to the doctrine act consistently. Let instructions come; and I hope, if the Senator from Pennsylvania receives his, he will be guilty of no evasion, but meet them boldly, and either obey them, or resign and go home, and leave his place to one that will conform. And the Senator from New York, too, if am not misinformed, when he was asked what was to be done in relation to his colleague, replied, instruct him; if I am correctly informed, such was his language. I hope the instructions will come, and come I am confident they will, from that source which gentlemen of the party say they are bound to obey—from the people and the representatives of the people. And Virginia, too; but, sir, I believe the party there is a hung jury; however, at the next election the people will order a venire de novo against the Sub-Treasury. And in the State from which the Senator (Mr. GRUNDY) this morning presented the resolutions, in the Legislature of that State the instructions were adopted by a majority approximating to unanimity. In the Senate of that State there 18 to 7, and in the House of Representatives 39 to 19—39! the Mosaic law—forty save one—and very properly applied to such a system as this Sub-Treasury project. And the great leading State of the West; that State to whose opinions we are all disposed to bow with respect—she, too, declares her opinions in very intelligible language. How will her Senators act? Sir, I will answer for myself, that if instructions come from the Legislature of my State against this Sub-Treasury scheme, I pledge my word that I will conform to them. (A laugh.)

On the whole (said Mr. C.) I think the Senator from Pennsylvania can draw no conclusions of comfort from these transactions at Boston. It appears to me, on the contrary, that this system which three years ago was to give perfect security to the public money, and to give us, too, a far better currency, having failed, I think, when the Sub-Treasury comes to replace it, millions will be lost, where one dollar was lost even by that now exploded system.
